After they saw Jamie again and said good night to him, they had dinner at the Hotel Aldermont. Sam suggested to Carol that she drive on back to Suffern with Nancy and Bucky and he would stay over and bring Jamie up the next day. But when he sensed how reluctant she was to be parted from him, he went to the hotel desk and took two rooms for the night. Tommy Kent tried to insist that he could get a bus back to camp, but Sam drove him back. Nancy had wanted to come along, but Sam told her to stay with her Anybody hurt bad?"

"A split lip and some bruises. They weren't going fast. Where can I get help?"

"We're on our way back to town. We could send Charlie Hall back out with his wrecker for the car. Ed, if you want to wait here and ride back in with Charlie, I could take the lady and the kids in and leave them off at Doc Evans'."

Sam helped Carol across the ditch and put her in the sedan. She made no protest. There was just room for Bucky in back with the tools. Jamie sat on Nancy's lap in front. The driver got in and said, "Doc Evans is on the left-hand side in a white house just when you get inside the town limits."

As they drove off Sam said to the man named Ed, "I didn't even remember to thank him."

"I don't guess his feelings are hurt. I can't get this straightened out. Who was driving what?"

"My wife was driving the station wagon and I was leading in the MG with my daughter. I happened to look back when it happened."

"I get it. Pretty tricky thing to stay out of trouble when you lose a front wheel."

"Front wheel?" Sam said. "I didn't even notice that."

"Ought to be around here someplace. Left front wheel, probably ran off the other side."

They found it after five minutes of search, fifty feet from the road. The chrome rim had glinted in the sun and Ed had spotted it. Three cars stopped and were waved on. Ed got down in the ditch and looked at the wheel bolts. He touched one gently with a thick finger.

"Funny," he said.

"What's the matter?"

"Nothing sheared. The threads got chewed up some. How far you come?"

"From Aldermont."

"Well, I'd guess you had maybe only three nuts on here and each one of those turned on just enough to catch the threads. Kids act

The wrecker arrived a few moments after m found the hubcap in the ditch on the her side. The car was efficiently winched up to its rear wheels and pulled out of the tch. The right side of the station wagon was umpled and two windows were cracked. m listened to directions about how to find e repair garage, thanked Ed, and drove in the doctor's. The small town was called lendon. The doctor's name was Biscoe. He plained he was taking over the practice from octor Evans.

He took Sam off into a small examination om and closed the door and offered Sam a garette. "Mr. Bowden, is your wife, would u say, a nervous woman? Tense?"

"No."

"Then has she been under some great strain tely?"

"Yes. A very great strain indeed."

He waved his cigarette. "I sense—you ow—undercurrents. The boy's bullet wound. checked to see if the stitches held. This is ne of my business. But were it my wife, I uld take steps to see the strain is ended. on. It is like combat. She has committed her reserves. She is totally in action. She uld be broken."

"What would that mean?"

"Who can say? Retreat from reality when ality becomes more than she wishes to ar, or can afford to bear."

"But she's very stable."

Biscoe smiled. "But not dull stable, stupid able. No. Intelligent, sensitive, imaginative. e is frightened out of her wits, Mr. Bowden. have given her a mild sedative. You can get is prescription filled for her, please."

"How about her mouth?"

"Not enough of a split to try to stitch. I opped the bleeding. It will be puffed out for few days. The small one is pleased with his mp. He admires it in the mirror. No other mage."

"I have to go and see about the car. Would be imposing too much if I asked to leave em here while I check?"

"Not at all. Miss Walker will have your bill, Mr. Bowden. Your wife is resting and your ell-behaved children are out in the back miring my Belgian hares."

The station wagon was on the alignment ck being worked on. The service manager id, "Not much damage. We had to use a file n a couple of those chewed threads before e could get the wheel back on. It's way out alignment, but I don't think the frame is rung. Neither right-hand door will open. 've replaced the oil that ran out. Hammering e body out would be a long job, of course. ut I imagine you want to get back on the ad."

"I'd like to. I don't think my wife will want drive. Can you people store my MG for a w days?"

"Sure thing."

"How soon will the car be ready?"

"Give us another forty minutes."

"Can I give you a check?"

"Certainly."

After he had got the prescription filled, he ent back to the doctor's. The nurse showed m where Carol was resting. The shades were rawn and her eyes were shut, but she wasn't sleep. She opened her eyes when he approached the bed. There were spatters of dried lood on her blouse. She smiled weakly and e sat down and took her hand, sat on the dge of the bed.

"I guess all my sawdust ran out," she said.

"About time, wasn't it?"

"I'm ashamed of myself. But it wasn't tipping over in the car. I guess you know that. It as Jamie. Ever since it happened. A little boy ke that. Trying to kill him with a gun. Trying o shoot him to death, like killing a little nimal."

"I know."

"I just couldn't stop thinking about it. Does ny mouth look terrible?"

"Horrible," he said, grinning at her.

"You know, when I look down I can see my upper lip. It's cut on the inside. He packed something in there. He's very nice."

"He gave you something."

"I know. It takes the edges off everything. It makes me feel floaty. Is the car ruined?"

"It'll be ready to roll in a half hour. It won't be pretty, but it'll run."

"That's wonderful! But—but I don't want to drive it any more today."

"I'm storing the MG here and we'll all go in the wagon."

"All right, dear."

"How did it act?"

"Right from the first it wasn't steering right. You know, it sort of wandered. I thought it was out of line again. I had to steer it every minute. And then, on curves, it would make a funny crunchy noise up in the front somewhere. Then, just before it happened, it got much worse. There was a terrible vibration. I was just starting to put my foot on the brake and blow the horn for you to stop when I saw that wheel go scooting out ahead of me. Just when I realized what it was, we were turning over and something hit me in the mouth. Do they know what happened?"

"Somebody loosened the nuts."

She looked up at him and then closed her eyes and shut her hand hard on his fingers. "Oh, God," she whispered.

"He knows the car. He would know the nearest hospital was in Aldermont. He could find that out. Aldermont isn't large. I don't imagine they have a night watchman on that lot across from the hotel. If we'd taken the main road with all that fast traffic, it might have been a different story."

"When does all our luck run out? How long do we wait before that happens?"

"They'll pick him up."

"They'll never pick him up. You know that. I know that. And if they pick him up, they'll let him go again the way they did last time."

"Please, Carol."

She turned her face away from him. Her voice was far away. "I think I was about seven years old. My mother was still alive. We went to a carnival. There was a merry-go-round and my father lifted me up onto a big white horse. It was wonderful for a while. I held the brass pole and the horse went up and down. I didn't know until later that my father paid the man to make it a long, long ride. After a while the faces of the people began to blur. The music seemed to get louder. When I looked out all I could see were streaks. I wanted it to stop. When I shut my eyes I felt I was going to fall off. Nobody could hear me yell. I had the feeling it was going faster and faster and the music was getting louder and louder, and I was going to be hurled off."

"Honey, please."

"I want it to stop, Sam. I want it to stop going around and around. I want to stop being scared."

She looked at him with naked plea. He had never felt so helpless in his life. Or loved her so much.

When they arrived at The West Wind in the late afternoon Sam phoned the office again and told Bill Stetch about the accident and then, on sudden impulse, heard himself say, "I'd like to take all of next week off."

There was a silence on the line and then Bill said, "O.K., partner. Hope you get everything straightened away."

"I'm going to try, Bill. And thanks."

After completing the call, he went back to Carol's room and sat at the small desk and, using a pencil and paper to help his concentration, he tried to determine through process of logic if Cady could have found out about the Suffern hide-out. He made a short list of the people who knew about it. He questioned Jamie and Nancy and they vowed most solemnly that they had told no one. Except Tommy. And Nancy was certain Tommy had told no one. He checked with the owner and by judicious use of white lies learned that there had been no inquiries about Mrs. Bowden. The phone calls had been made from the office, but he had placed them himself. Mail had been delivered directly to the office. He had posted his letters to Carol himself. The possibility of Cady's tailing them to Suffern was remote. He thought back over the possible times and decided it was so remote as to be checked off entirely.

In the end he decided that Suffern was safe. With proper care it would remain safe. He knew he could not function efficiently if he based his moves on hunch and superstitious alarm. There had to be some starting place. Suffern was safe. So Suffern was an adequate base, a place to operate from.

On Friday and Saturday and Sunday they vegetated. Rest and the sedative improved Carol's nerves. They swam, ate hugely and slept long hours. And slowly, hour by hour, the resolution grew in Sam's mind. He found it almost impossible to face it at first. But it became easier and easier. The concept was so alien to his nature as to revolt him. It meant a reversal of all his values, of all the things he lived by. He knew that this inner combat made visible changes in his manner. Several times he saw Carol looking at him speculatively. He knew he seemed moody and absent-minded.

Monday, an oppressively hot day, he took Carol out in one of the yellow rowboats. The sky in the east had a coppery and ominous look. A moist infrequent wind would ripple the water and then die into a waiting stillness. Carol sat in the stern in white shorts and red halter and trailed her finger tips in the water as he rowed out into the middle of the mile-long lake. He boated the dripping oars and the boat moved smoothly along until momentum died.

"You're acting weird, you know," she said.

"I know."

"And this is the time to reveal all?"

"Yes. But questions first. How are you now?"

"Better, I think. I could go to pieces again if I made a good try at it. Since you convinced me we're safe here, and because we're all here together, I feel better. But not joyous. You say it's safe, but my litter of three are over there, a half mile across the water, and I don't feel really good unless I can see them and touch them."

"I know."

"Why do you want to know how I am? Outside of polite curiosity."

"There's something I want to do. I can't do it alone."

"What do you mean?"

"I've been up one side of this and down the other. I want to kill Cady."

"Of course. So do I, but ——"

"That was not a figure of speech. I mean that I want to plan it all out and lay a trap and kill him. I want to commit murder, and I think I know how it can be done."

She stared at him for what seemed a long time. And then she looked away, as though in shyness. "Not murder. Execution."

"Don't help me rationalize. Murder. And it may go wrong, but not if we're careful. Have you got guts enough to help me?"

"I have. It would be doing something. It would be something besides waiting around and looking at the children and wondering which one you're going to lose. Yes, Sam. I can help and you can depend on me and there won't be any going to pieces either. Waiting is what ruined me. Action won't."

"That's what I hoped. Your part is harder than mine."

"Tell me," she said. She was leaning forward, dark eyes frowningly intent, tanned arms crossed and resting on her knees. He looked at her and thought of how good her legs were, and how all of her was truly compact and vibrant. The gusts of wind had turned the boat and the far-off copper was higher in the sky, and the water at that end of the lake behind her looked dark. The dark water and the sky made the white houses stand out clearly at that end of the lake.

It was, to him, a moment of curious significance, of a dramatic unreality. This, he thought, cannot be Sam and Carol, man and wife. He had thought he knew this woman and knew himself. But this was a time of change. There was a new quality of tension and excitement between them, but there was an unhealthiness about it, a tinge of rot.

"You can help me plan it. I just have . . . a general idea. It started with something the sheriff said. I haven't worked out the details. We leave the kids here. Nancy can accept the responsibility."

"What do we tell them?"

"We certainly don't tell them what we want to do. We can think of something. Some plausible lie. You and I go back home. We have to gamble that he'll come there. Particularly if he thinks you are alone. We'll have to make it look that way, somehow. We can't take a chance of giving him the same kind of chance at you he had at Jamie. I've been thinking of the layout. If you were in the side yard or in back of the house, he'd have that chance. You'd be clearly visible in any window in the back of the house at night."

"Or any window at night? Where will you be?"

"I should be hidden in the house somewhere. Waiting."

"Won't he know it's a trap? Won't he sense it?"

"Perhaps. But we ought to make it look good. It's the details I haven't figured out yet."

She bit at the corner of her thumbnail. "If you could be in the top of the barn?"

"I'd be too far away. I ought to be in the house with you."

"If there was some sort of signal system, it wouldn't be too far. Didn't Nancy and Sandra fix up a buzzer thing a couple of years ago?"

"And got me to string the wire. I know the wire is still up."

"I could sleep in Nancy's room. You could get it working again."

"But why the kids' place in the barn?"

"I thought how we could make it look right. You could take the MG. Then I could go out in the wagon as though I was going shopping. I could pick you up someplace and you could lie down in the wagon and I could drive right into the barn when I come back, and then go to the house with a bundle of groceries. And we could buy food you could keep in the top of the barn. I mean that would be a way to come back without him knowing it."

"But if he doesn't see me leave?"

"The one car would be gone anyway, and if we did it any other way, he might see you come back."

"I could wait until night and sneak into the house."

"If it's supposed to look as if I'm alone in the house, the best way is to be alone in the house. And if he's watching he'll satisfy himself I'm alone, and then he'll come in after me."

"We've got to be sure we can handle him."

"I'll have the Woodsman and you'll have that new gun. There's a lot of things I can do to make sure I'll be safe from him long enough. Like stringing pots and pans on the stairs so he'd have to make a noise."

"Can you handle it, Carol? Can you?"

"I know I can."

"Then there's another part to the problem. Suppose we . . . are successful? What then?"

"Well, wouldn't he be a prowler? I mean can't you shoot a prowler? And the police know about him, don't they? And he is a criminal. Couldn't we just call?"

"I—I guess so. I guess that would be all right."

"We can do it, darling. We have to do it."

"And we can't be careless. Not for a minute. We've got to stay as cold as ice."

"What if nothing happens?"

"Something will. He can't afford to wait much longer. He wants to move in and finish it. Shall we go back in the morning?"

"Today, darling. Please. Let's go today and get it started and then it will be over. Row back now, please."

After lunch they drove to Ellendon to pick up the MG. They arrived home a little after five and put the two cars in the barn, and hurried to the house with their luggage. When they went across the lawn Sam realized he was hurrying with his shoulders hunched, and trying to stay between Carol and the hill that rose behind the barn. He felt relief when they reached the comparative safety of the front porch. He sensed that it was absurd to imagine that Cady would be sprawled up there on the hill, cheek against the stock, finger on the trigger, tracking them with the telescopic sight. He could not be that ready. But, on the other hand, it was equally absurd to assume that he would not be ready, and act as if he were not ready.

Before dark he went up to the attic window in the rear of the house and carefully searched the hillside with his binoculars. He wished it were not so heavily wooded, that there were not so many huge gray boulders, so many deadfalls.

They went through the house together, before dark, deciding what areas were safe. They decided it would be unwise to use the kitchen at night. She could use the study and use Nancy's room. After dark he risked going out to make certain that he could not see into either of those two lighted rooms from outside. He circled the house with the revolver in his hand, moving with caution, stopping where the night shadows were most black to wait and listen.

When he went back into the house he found he had spent too long outside. Carol held him tightly and he felt her body tremble. He locked the house with great care, checking every door and window. They slept in their own room. Carol went to sleep in his bed, his arms around her, and the gun under the pillow, the bedroom door locked, a Rube Goldberg trap of pans and string blocking both stairways.

Tuesday, the sixth of August, was a golden day. After breakfast he checked the buzzer system, and Carol went with him when he drove down to get batteries. Before they left he checked the station wagon over carefully.

Each time they had to cross between house and barn, they moved very quickly. And each time he glanced up at the hill. He became more and more convinced that Cady was up there. And he would not be at all surprised that they ran.

When the buzzer system was working and had been completely checked, they decided on signals. During waking hours she would press her toy telegraph key three times, quickly, on the hour, and he would return the same signal. She would leave Nancy's room only when it was absolutely necessary, and then for as brief a time as possible. It was evident that he could not break in without arousing her. At the first suspicious noise she was to hold the key down for a single long signal.

The tension was grim and strong. They said no more to each other than was necessary, and they both avoided looking into each other's eyes. It was as though they had embarked on some project that shamed them.

He said, "I think we're as ready as we'll ever be."

"How soon will I follow you?"

"This is the part I don't like. It shouldn't be too soon. But I don't want to leave you alone any longer than I have to."

"I'll be all right. It's a chance we have to take. It's eleven o'clock now. Twelve o'clock sharp?"

"All right." He looked at her, wondering about her.

She touched his arm. "It's not so bad in the daytime, really. I'll be careful, and I'll be all right."

He kissed her quickly and found her lips cool and dry and unresponsive. He waited on the porch until he heard her lock the door. He backed the MG out, swung it around quickly and headed down to the village. He put the car in Barlow's garage for a complete engine overhaul. He walked from there to the new supermarket on the far side of the village. He bought a good flashlight and the food he thought he would need. As it grew closer and closer to noon his tension increased. The village horn blew at noon. A chill drop of sweat ran down his ribs. At five after twelve, just as he was beginning to feel frantic, she came through the front door and paused, looked around until she saw him, and came directly toward him.

"Betty Hennis stopped by," she said in a low voice. "I had to be rude to get rid of her. Have you got everything you'll need? Let me see." She made a few more selections. "I think we should kill some time, dear," she said. "If I've gone shopping, I shouldn't return too soon. And you should get something to read."

He did not know at which precise moment he turned against their careful plan. He had thought they could do it. He had thought Cady could be handled. But there was so much at stake, so much that could go wrong. And the whole device seemed so totally out of character for both of them. He had the feeling that if it succeeded, it would turn their world into a jungle from which they could never escape.

"Let me drive," he said as they walked toward the station wagon.

"What? What are you going to do?"

"I'm going into the city. We're going into the city. I'm going to try Captain Dutton again."

Her voice trembled. "He hasn't done anything. He won't do anything. It won't do any good. Let's do it our way."

"I've got to try this one last time." He smiled bitterly and sadly. "Rack it up to my intense devotion to law and order."

"He won't do anything, and he'll stop us from doing what we want to do."

"Don't start to cry."

"But it puts us back where we were. Just waiting and waiting and being scared every minute."

Capt. Mark Dutton was out, and they had to wait over forty minutes before he came back to headquarters. The waiting room was barren and depressing. Carol sat woodenly, her face stamped with hopelessness.

At last a clerk came for them and took them to Dutton's office. Dutton greeted them with bored courtesy. They sat in two chairs near his desk.

Sam said, "Did you hear about . . . the trouble we had down at ——"

"A report and a request for information came in from Sheriff Kantz. There's a pickup order out on Cady. Unless he leaves the area, he won't stay loose very long. How is your boy?"

"He's all right. We were lucky."

"How long can we keep on being lucky?" Carol said flatly.

Dutton gave her a quick measuring glance. "Are your children in a safe place?"

"We think so. We hope so," Sam said. "But in a business like this, there are no guaranties. The man is insane."

Dutton nodded. "From what's happened, assuming he was the sniper, I'd say that was a fair estimate, Mr. Bowden."

Dutton listened with no change of expression while Sam told him of the loosened wheel lugs.

"All I can say to you is I hope we can pick him up soon. I don't know what other assurances I can give you. I've given the job the best priority I can give it. If you people can . . . be careful until we ——"

"You want us to hide," Carol said sharply.

"That's one way to put it, Mrs. Bowden," Dutton told her.

"You want us to hide and wait and then, when he's wanted for murder, you'll give it some extra priority."

"Now just a moment, Mrs. Bowden. I explained to your husband ——"

Carol stood up. "There's a lot of explaining going on. I didn't want to come here. I'm sorry I came here. I knew you'd be nice and rational, Captain Dutton. I knew you'd pat us on the head and send us away full of some kind of forlorn confidence that you people will be able to handle this."

"Now just ——"

"I'm talking, Captain Dutton. And I'm talking to you and I want you to listen. We were going to try to trap that . . . animal. We were going to use me as bait. And we were going to depend on the gun you let my husband carry. I'm astonished you went so far as to let him have a gun. And when everything was arranged, he felt he had to come down here and see you again. And I knew it would be just the same as before."

"Carol ——"

"Be still, Sam. The world is full of too many little men full of self-important petty authority, and not one ounce of imagination or kindness. So fill out all your neat little priority forms, captain, and we'll go home and try to do it our way. Unless, of course, you can quote some law that will restrain us from even trying. My children are threatened, captain, and if I can kill Mr. Cady, I will gladly do so, with a gun or a knife or a club. Let's go, Sam."

"Sit down, Mrs. Bowden."

"I don't see as how ——"

"Sit down!" For the first time there was the full ring of dominance and authority in the man's voice.

Carol sat.

Dutton turned toward Sam. "Just how did you plan to trap Cady into coming to you?"

"There's a lot of ifs. If I can be smuggled back in the station wagon and sneak into the kids' room in the barn. If he is watching the house. If our signal system works. If he thinks Carol is alone, and decides to come after her. If I can fire at him and hit him."

Dutton looked at Carol. "Do you people think he's watching your house?"

"I think so. Yes," Carol said. "Maybe it's just nerves. But I think he is. We're pretty isolated there."

"Please wait right here," Dutton said, and left the office quickly.

"I'm sorry, darling," Carol said. Her mouth was trembling.

"You were slightly magnificent."

"I made a fool of myself. But he made me so angry."

Dutton was gone for a full fifteen minutes. When he came back he had a young man with him, a brown young man in his twenties, short and stocky, with mild blue eyes and brown hair that needed cutting. He wore a white shirt, dark blue trousers, and a yellow pencil behind his ear.

He stood at semi-attention as Dutton went around his desk and sat down. "This is Corporal Kersek. He's restless, unmarried, a first-class pistol shot, and bored with his current assignment in communications. Andy, this is Mr. and Mrs. Bowden. I've cleared his assignment with the county and with the state police. Andy was an infantryman in Korea. I can assign him to you for three days, Mr. Bowden. He understands the situation in general. Go over your plan with him in detail, and accept his recommendations for any changes. Good luck to you. . . . And—Mr. Bowden."

"Yes?"

Dutton smiled thinly. "You have an alarmingly effective wife. And a very handsome one."

Carol flushed and smiled and said, "Thank you, Captain Dutton."

They talked with Kersek. Sam explained the original plan, and made a rough sketch of the house, barn and grounds on a yellow pad.

"About how far from the house to the barn, Mr. Bowden?"

"A hundred feet."

"I think it'll be better if I'm in the cellar. I can make it there after dark. You could open cellar window for me, Mrs. Bowden."

It pleased Sam that Kersek did not in any way question that Cady would make an attempt. It made the whole project seem more businesslike and official.

After Kersek drew the equipment he thought he would need, they drove him to his rooming house, where he changed to dark shabby slacks, a dark shirt, tennis shoes.

Before they reached the village, Sam and Kersek stretched out in the back of the wagon and pulled a dusty car blanket over them. Sam knew all the familiar turns. He felt the pitch of the hill, and knew just when she would have to slow down for the driveway. When she drove into the barn, less light came through the blanket, and the motor sound became louder before she turned it off. She opened the left-rear door and picked up the bag of groceries for the house.

"Be careful," Sam said in a low voice. She nodded, her lips compressed. He and Kersek got out of the car and he stood well back from the dusty window and watched her scurry across the lawn toward the house, through the late-afternoon sunlight, moving with all the clean grace so familiar and so dear to him. He saw her unlock the door, go inside and close it. He turned and saw that Kersek was tensed and waiting, head cocked.

"What's the matter?"

"He could be inside waiting. She'd get a chance to yell once."

Sam berated himself for not having thought of that. They stood in the intense silence of the barn, listening. The cooling motor of the station wagon ticked. Suddenly, startling both of them, the buzzer sounded in the upstairs room, three short quick sounds.

"All clear," Sam said gratefully. He climbed the ladder quickly and returned her signal. It was just four o'clock. Kersek helped him carry his stuff up and get organized. Kersek left his supplies near the foot of the ladder. They sat upstairs on the old Army cot, surrounded by broken toys, half-completed projects, a hundred pictures cut out of magazines and tacked and pasted to the rough walls, and they talked in low voices. Sam told Andy Kersek the complete story of Max Cady.

The single cobwebbed window looked toward the house, and from where he sat Sam could look along the thin wires that sagged and lifted again to enter the house through the hole drilled in Nancy's window frame. He could see a portion of the hill behind the house, but he did not try to see more of it because he did not want to get his face too close to the window.

Carol sent her brisk signal each hour on the hour. After they had exhausted the subject of Cady, Kersek talked about Korea and how it had been, and how he had been hurt and how it had felt. They both read for a time—Kersek reading at random in the great pile of dusty comic books in the corner. And at last it grew too dark to read and too dark to smoke.

Carol buzzed at nine and at ten, and Kersek muffled the buzzer, suspecting the sound might carry too far in the stillness of the night.

"Time to move," Kersek said. He held his hand out and Sam took it.

"I don't want anything to happen to her," Sam said.

"Nothing will." There were reassurance and confidence in his voice. Sam followed him down the dark ladder, feeling his way. Kersek drifted out into the night. He made no sound. Sam strained his eyes to see him, but he could not. Kersek had smudged his face, and his clothes were dark, and he moved with the ease and vigilance of a trained man.

The faint light that showed around Nancy's window went out at ten-thirty. He tried to sleep, but he could not. He listened to the sounds of the long summer night, the insect chorus and the distant dogs, and the few cars on the road, and the far-off trucks, and a long brazen diesel hoot, far down the valleys.

The first light of dawn awakened him, and he moved the cot back away from the window. There was no signal at six, and he resisted the temptation to initiate a signal. The slow minutes passed. The hour from six to seven seemed but little longer than eternity. There was no signal from her at seven. The house looked silent and dead. They were in there, slain while he slept. At five after seven he could wait no longer. He initiated the signal. Twenty seconds later, as he was reaching again for the key, his mouth dry and his heart pounding, the signal was returned. He took a long deep breath, and was immediately sorry he had awakened her. She needed sleep so very badly.

He ate. The long morning passed. A salesman parked in front of the house and walked to the front door and waited there several minutes before giving up and driving away. A brown-and-white cat stalked a bird across the lawn, tail twitching, ears forward, body crouched. It sprang and missed and looked up into the elm for a few moments, then sat and washed neatly, and strolled away, the birds scolding it.

By noon his worry over the children had become intense. If Cady had found out, somehow——But Carol had promised to call them twice a day, and if anything was wrong, she would have come running to the barn.

He could not remember ever having spent a longer day. He watched the shadows change, and lengthen. At six the sun went behind a bank of dull cloud in the west behind the house, and night came earlier than usual. She made her last signal at ten o'clock and her light was out shortly afterward.

Teddy Nadler, whose prodigious memory won fame and fortune on TV, adds to his storehouse of facts.

PIETRO

What is INTELLIGENCE?

After the quiz is over, what can be done with the facts?

By LESLIE B. HOHMAN, M.D.

It was an exciting adventure to be permitted to interview a human being like Ted Nadler. This forty-seven-year-old man has a memory for facts that is so extraordinary—prodigious, colossal—that it's almost unbelievable. You can't think up an exaggerated statement that will express his memory skill. To think of a man who can describe battle contestants, the places, the number of troops, the weather, the date and the outcome of a thousand battles is to think of a talking encyclopedia. This father of three boys and the possessor of a pretty, adoring wife looks down a little on professors of history because they do not have his factual knowledge of historical events. He wonders why famous baseball players know their batting averages less well than he does. His ability on a quiz program to challenge contestants in any category made him a name of fame and a lot of thousands of dollars.

With this extraordinary memory and extraordinary knowledge of facts, why has it taken Teddy Nadler so long to achieve recognition? Before inquiring into this question, it must be said that Teddy Nadler is a lucky man. His wife is a real blessing to him. Not only is she attractive-looking, but she has the belief that Teddy and the three boys she has borne him are nigh perfection. Her whole life is her husband and three boys. That is what attracted Teddy to her and what makes him so happy with her—he says she's like a European woman in that her only interest is her home and family. She is a compliant person. She lets Teddy do the food shopping because he likes the job and doesn't mind spending for extravagant food for his children. If he doesn't want to buy electric appliances or household items, she's satisfied. She thinks Teddy is a marvelous father, entertaining to the children, and makes them very happy when he's with them, and he likes to be with them. Clara Nadler says that the boys, her husband, her family, his family, their house—everything connected with her is wonderful. She uses the word over and over—everything is wonderful. It is indeed heart-warming to find a woman so completely happy with her family and so admiring of them in every way.

Teddy Nadler is a likable person in spite of the fact that he has many qualities that would make the average person who had these traits unlikable. For example, in the past he thinks he has been unfairly discriminated against. He thinks the men who let him do all the work on his job let themselves take all the credit and, incidentally, the promotions.

I suggest that the reason these ideas of persecution are not irritating or disturbing to his likableness is that he has ways of creating the idea of modesty about himself—even though he is at times too full of self-praise!

A puzzle immediately confronts you when you ask why a man with so prodigious a memory has not made more of himself. Except for the accident of quiz programs, Teddy would still be earning less than $4000 a year. He had to live in cramped, close quarters—three rooms for five people; he had no significant promotions after fifteen years in his job as clerk-laborer in a military-supply depot. Even menial workers got promotions over him.

What did he lack that made him not successful in income, job and place in the world?

It brings up the whole question of what is theoretic intelligence and what is usable intelligence.

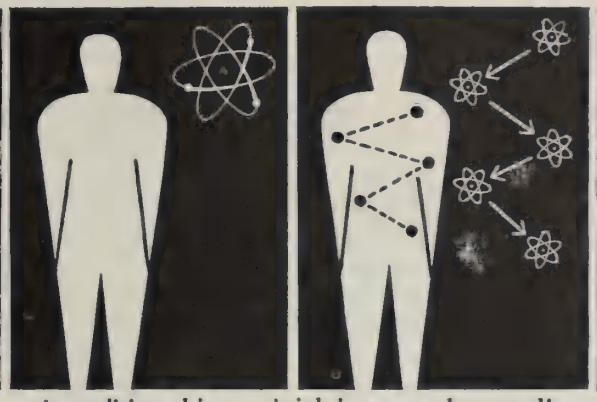
All psychologists today are agreed that intelligence is made up of a series or a number of different abilities. Memory is one of these abilities. The ability to calculate, to use common sense in situations requiring judgment, and to know the meaning of words of a sufficiently large vocabulary are other examples of the abilities that are thought of as intelligence.

It is also agreed by psychologists that intelligence is made up of many individual capabilities, but it is also dependent upon how the capacities are put together. A capability is of no service if a person doesn't know how and when to use it or if he is so emotionally upset that his thinking is made useless. An example of this would be an individual who is so upset emotionally by having to take orders that he becomes confused when asked to do his job, which may be calculations.

Although there are many capabilities which go to make up intelligence and although they appear to be very different from one another, nevertheless it has been proved that these capacities are strung together on a thread of general intelligence. If an individual is very good in one field, he tends to be good in other fields. It is also known that a very highly developed individual capacity such as memory does not markedly influence or add to the general intelligence of an individual.

Intelligence, which is a sum total of individual capacities strung together on general intelligence, to be highly usable, must enable a person to act wisely and with directed purpose. Everybody knows some person who is smart but never gets anywhere in the world of either professional or business success simply because he or she doesn't know how to direct his or her skills into usable channels.

Another quality which is an essential part of intelligence and intelligent behavior is incentive and ambition and drive. Without ambition and drive nobody can succeed; and by succeed I do not mean to suggest money success—I mean success in realizing one's capabilities to the fullest.



In Ted Nadler's case, there are two big points to be borne in mind. No one can judge another's success by his own definition of that word. A man or a woman is successful by his or her own definitions—roughly equated by happiness, satisfaction, self-evaluation. Ted often refers to himself as a "nobody," as a "dumbbell," is frequently self-deprecating, often bitter, and troubled by the gap between his potential achievements and his real ones. As we talk of success in his case, then, we will base it not on such ready gauges as wealth or prestige, but on Ted's own feeling that he is not a happy or successful man in a key area of his life—his work.

The second point to be brought out is this: much of Ted's effort has been exceedingly successful. It went into overcoming severe handicaps when as a child he was least fortified to deal with them. Problems that would give any adult pause—poverty, life in an institution, cruelty by strangers, physical difficulties, ill and troubled parents—were surmounted by Ted as a child in such a way as . . . fogged dream in a deep sleep, dream interrupted by the morning alarm clock. And he groped for the clock that was not there, and suddenly sat up in absolute darkness, his reactions so blurred by heavy sleep that for long and precious seconds he did not know where he was, nor why his heart should be hammering so heavily.

When shrill realization came, he rolled off the cot and tried to scoop up the gun and the flashlight. His body was clumsy with sleep and he pawed the flashlight away from him and then found it in the darkness. He lowered himself hastily through the trap door, found the rungs of the ladder with his toes. He had not anticipated how awkward it would be to try to climb down in complete darkness carrying a gun and flashlight.

His foot slipped, and when he tried to catch himself his hand slipped. He fell and landed with his right foot on something uneven. It was an eight-foot drop and he landed with his entire weight on the right ankle. It felt as though a white flare had exploded inside his ankle. He fell heavily, faint with pain, a sprawling fall that brought him up against a wheel of the car, rolling in darkness, empty-handed, his sense of direction completely confused. He got up onto his hands and knees, grunting with pain, and he realized the long alarm cry of the buzzer had stopped. He began to paw around in the darkness, sweeping his hands across the floor, feeling for gun and flashlight.

He touched the roundness of the flashlight, snatched it up and pushed the switch, but it did not light. He heard a scream of complete and shocking terror, a scream that seemed to tear a long and ragged strip off his heart, and he heard the muffled and yet brittle sound of the Woodsman as two shots were fired.

He was sobbing with fright and frustration and pain. He touched the butt of the revolver and snatched it up and tried to stand. When he put weight on the ankle he fell again, and crawled to the wall and pulled himself up. Just then he heard the second scream quavering across the night air, a piece of silver wire stretched out to an unendurable point to then snap into a silence which was worse than the scream.

From somewhere he found the strength to walk, and then the strength to break into a blundering run. The night was utterly black. There was misty rain on his face. He felt as though he were trying to run in chest-deep water. The right foot flopped uselessly, and each time he came down on it he felt as though it landed in white-hot coals, ankle deep.

He fell on the front steps, struggled up and found the door and knew in despair that it was locked and that he had no key and it would take him an eternity to find his way around the house and find where Cady had broken in. That was another thing they had not considered. Another tragic oversight. But where was Kersek?

Just at that moment he heard a sound that must have come from a man's throat, but it was utterly unlike any human sound he had ever heard. It was a snarling, roaring sound, full of anger and madness and a bestial frenzy. And there was the deep resonant bang of a weapon heavier than the Woodsman, a sound that rattled the windows.

There was an enormous crashing and clanging and thudding of something running or falling down the front stairs, bringing Carol's alarm system of pots and pans and string with it. And a jar that shook the house.

Before he could move, the locked front door burst open and a half-seen figure, wide and hard and stocky and incredibly quick, came plunging out and smashed into him and drove him back. There was a sick sense of floating as he sailed backward over the steps, and then he landed flat on his back on the wet grass with a great jar that knocked the wind out of him.

He had managed to hold onto the revolver. He rolled up onto his knees, gagging for breath, and heard the pound of running feet on the turf, saw something running toward the corner of the house. He fired three times at it, snap-shooting, taking no aim. He got up and wobbled to the corner of the house. He was still sobbing for breath, but he managed to hold his breath and listen. He heard something that moved with frantic haste, crashing up through the brush on the hillside behind the house. He fired twice at the sound and listened again, and heard it recede and become fainter and disappear entirely.

When he turned back, his ankle folded again and he fell against the side of the house, hitting his head. He crawled on his hands and knees. He crawled up the steps and through the open front door and found the light switch in the lower hall and turned it on.

He could hear a faint mewling sound, a hopeless sound of fright and pain and heartbreak so like the unforgettable sound he had heard so long ago in a Melbourne alley that it seemed to him his heart would stop.

The sound continued as he climbed the stairs on his hands and knees. Halfway up he threw the empty gun aside. When he reached the upper hallway, he turned on the light. Kersek lay in the hallway outside the door of Nancy's room. The door was open. The room was in darkness. The endless whimpering sound came from inside the room.

Kersek blocked the hall. His gun lay five feet from him. Sam had to clamber over him. He tried to be gentle. Kersek groaned as he climbed over him. He turned on Nancy's room light. The bedside table was tipped over, the lamp shattered. Carol lay half under the bed, curled in fetal position. She wore her pajama trousers. The top was ripped off her, hanging by one sleeve. There were two deep bleeding scratches on her back. She made the endless and broken sound with each breath as he crawled toward her. When he tried to pull her out from under the bed, she fought him, and her eyes were squeezed tightly shut.

"Carol!" he said sharply. "Carol, darling!"

The sound continued and then stopped. She opened her eyes cautiously, and when she turned he could see the purpling bruise that covered most of the left side of her face.

"Where were you?" she whispered. "Oh, where were you?"

"Are you all right?"

She worked her way out from under the bed. She sat up and buried her face in her hands. "He's gone?"

"Yes, darling, he's gone. Are you all right. Did he . . . hurt you?"

"Like an animal," she said brokenly. "He smelled like some kind of animal too. I didn't hear anything. Just a sort of scratching near the door. And I found the buzzer and pushed it for a long time and I had the gun, and then he ran right in through the door, right through it like it was paper and I fired and I screamed and I tried to fight. And he hit me."

"Did he . . . do anything to you?"

She frowned, as though trying to concentrate. "Oh, I know what you mean. No. He was going to. But then . . . Andy came." She tried to look beyond him. "Where is Andy?" she asked.

"Put your robe on, darling."

She seemed to pull herself together with a great effort. "I went all to pieces. I've never been so terrified. I'm sorry. But where were you? Why didn't you come?"

"I fell," he said, and turned and crawled back out into the hall. Kersek was breathing raggedly. Blood ran from the corner of his mouth. The leather grip of a hunting knife protruded grotesquely from his side, just below his right armpit.

He crawled down the hall to their bedroom and pulled himself up onto his bed and took the bedside phone from the cradle and dialed the operator.

"Sam Bowden," he said, "on the Milton Hill Road. We've got to have a doctor out here, and the police. Immediately. Emergency. Tell them to hurry, please. And an ambulance, please."

Five minutes later he heard the first siren, screaming up the hill through the misty night.

Doctor Allisson, after emergency treatment of Kersek, and after Andy had been taken away in the ambulance, treated the deep scratches on Carol's back, and as soon as she was in her own bed he gave her a sedative that put her into a deep sleep in thirty seconds.

After he had decided that Sam's ankle was badly sprained and not broken, he injected it with a local anesthetic and bound it tightly.

"Try to stand on it."

"It doesn't hurt at all!" Sam said wonderingly.

"Don't use it too much. Try to keep off it. But use it some. Big night you people are having out here."

"How about Kersek?"

Allisson shrugged. "Take a guess. He's young and he's in good shape. He was in shock. A lot depends on how long that blade is. Better to take it out on the table. I've got to get along. Those state cops are anxious to get at you."

When he went downstairs, favoring the dead ankle, he found that Captain Dutton had arrived. He was talking in low tones to a big man who managed to wear baggy pants and a leather jacket with a look of competence and importance.

Dutton nodded at Sam. "This is Captain Ricardo, of E Barracks, Mr. Bowden," he said. "I've been briefing him."

"How is Mrs. Bowden?" Ricardo asked.

"She was on the ragged edge. Doctor Allisson gave her a shot. He says she'll be dopey tomorrow, but rested." Sam moved over to a chair. "I'm supposed to stay off this ankle as much as I can."

"Apparently you and Kersek didn't handle this too well," Dutton said.

Sam stared at him. "If it wasn't for my wife and her little lecture," he told the policeman, "I would have been handling it myself, and it would have been a lot worse than it was, Captain Dutton."

Dutton flushed and said, "How were you staked out?"

"I was in the top of the barn with a buzzer alarm system rigged so she could call me. Kersek was in the cellar. The front stairs and the back stairs were booby-trapped. I'd like to know how he got in."

"We found out," the big state-police officer said. "He climbed up onto the shed roof over the kitchen porch and cut the screen out of the window at the end of the upstairs hallway and forced the latch."

Sam nodded tiredly. "And Kersek didn't hear him and that's what cut down the warning time. And he wouldn't hear the sound of the buzzer. The first thing he heard was her scream and the two shots she fired."

"Two?" Ricardo asked. "You're certain?"

"Almost certain."

Ricardo turned to Dutton. "We found two twenty-two slugs, one in the doorframe at chest level, and one in the plaster on the other side of the hallway, about six feet high. And one thirty-eight slug in the baseboard in the hallway. It struck at an angle and knocked a long splinter out."

"I was certain Kersek could handle himself," Dutton said.

Ricardo tugged at his ear lobe. "Handling a rough customer is one thing. Handling a nut is another. It was dark in the hall. Your man didn't know the layout, and he probably couldn't locate a light switch. And he was trying to move fast. This Cady probably came out of that room like a bomb."

"I fired at him too," Sam said.

"With the revolver we found on the stairs?"

"Yes."

"Where, and how many times?"

"Three times in the front yard. He knocked me off the porch. He was running to the corner of the house. Then I heard him going up the hill in back, and I tried two more at long range. But he kept going. I could hear him."

When the phone rang, one of Ricardo's people answered it, announced it was for Captain Dutton. Dutton went over to the phone. He listened for a time, spoke in monosyllables, hung up. When he turned, his face looked older, the eyes pouched and bitter.

"We won't know how he got suckered, Ricardo. He didn't make it. They lost him on the table."

"I'm sorry," Ricardo said.

"What are your plans?"

"This isn't an easy area to seal off. Too many back roads. And maybe we didn't get onto it soon enough. I don't know. But I've established the blocks. We can't use dogs, because we can't give them the scent. I've got a half-dozen more troopers reporting in a half hour. At first light we'll spread out and go up the hill and see if we can follow the track. I've got one boy who's pretty good at it. We can hope Mr. Bowden nicked him, and if he didn't we can hope we sealed off the area in time."

"Just in case we didn't, how about putting out an alarm?"

Ricardo nodded. "Six states. Give it the works. All right. Now how about the press? My people have been keeping them off our necks so far."

Dutton pursed his lips. "It's a cop killing. Let's get a big spread. We can release mug shots." He looked sharply at Sam. "They'll want a statement from you, if they can get it. I can handle it, if you wish."

"I'd like that."

"I'll do it now," Dutton said. "The quicker we cooperate, the friendlier they'll be." He went out the front door, heading for the cluster of lights and sounds of conversation by the barn.

Ricardo eased his tall big-boned weight into a chair. He said thoughtfully, "From what Dutton says, this Max Cady must be off his rocker."

"And he's big and fast and in good shape," Sam said.

Ricardo lighted a cigar carefully, examined the glowing end of it. "Some people named Turner from just up the road were here and my people sent them back. Good friends?"

"The best."

"Maybe somebody ought to be with your wife. Mrs. Turner O.K.?"

"Yes."

He got up. "Which house?"

"The next one up on the same side, thanks."

"I'll send one of my people up to get her." He went out.

Sam sat alone in the living room. He felt dulled by all the expenditure of emotion and energy. He thought of all the things he had done wrong. A clown act. Fall off the ladder. Can't get into the house. A great man of action. Decisive. All it needed was for him to have run into a clothesline in the dark. It was hard to believe Kersek was dead. Tough, competent, efficient Kersek. In dying, he had prevented the unthinkable from happening.

Liz Turner came hurrying in. She was a tall blonde who concealed incredible stores of energy behind a façade of a look of languid anemia.

"Sam, we've been frantic. It was like a war going on over here. By the time we got dressed and got over here, we got shooed off by the troopers. The trooper that picked me up told me a policeman was killed over here and you are both all right. How is Carol? Where is she?"

"Allisson gave her a shot. She's knocked out, but I don't know for how long. I thought if you wouldn't mind ——"

"Of course I wouldn't mind. I'll sit with her. In your bedroom? I'll go right up. Is it the man your Jamie told little Mike about? The one that poisoned Marilyn?"

He nodded. She looked at him for a moment and hurried to the stairs and went up, two steps at a time. He heard more cars arrive. He got up and went to the window and looked out. State troopers in uniform moved back and forth in front of the car lights. It was beginning to get light in the east. The rain had stopped. The trees dripped.

Ricardo came in and got him and had him come outside and show them where he had stood and fired at the hillside and point out where the noise had seemed to come from.

"I've got it organized now, Mr. Bowden. As soon as it's light enough to pick up a trail, we'll get going. I'll take ten men and we'll spread out. I'm leaving one man here. And here's your gun back. It's reloaded."

Just as Sam took the gun a flash bulb went off, and Ricardo turned in irritation. "What did I tell you press people?"

"Just a little break, cap," the man with the photographer said. He had a putty face, wide blue innocent eyes. "Every press service will grab this one. How about an exclusive interview, Mr. Bowden? I'm Jerry Jacks."

"Not now," Sam said, and walked slowly back to the house. Behind him he heard Ricardo shooing Jacks back toward the barn.

From the kitchen window he watched the line of men start up the hill, guns ready. He watched them until they were gone. The dawn sun was up. He went up to the bedroom. Liz smiled at him and held her finger to her lips. Carol breathed deeply and slowly, her bruised face relaxed, lips parted. Liz put her magazine aside. "She hasn't moved," she whispered. "Her poor face!"

After he went back downstairs he was too restless to sit and wait. He went out the kitchen door and sat on the back steps. The sun was high enough to warm his cheek and the backs of his hands.

The magic formula in human relations is simple—when you begin to dislike someone, do something nice for him.

In the silence of the morning he heard the voices before he saw them. They had chosen an easier path down the hill, the one that came down from the improvised range, past Marilyn's grave and out behind the barn.

He went over. Four troopers struggled with the improvised litter. Two saplings had been cut and trimmed and threaded through the arms of two uniform tunics. Cady lay on his back on the litter. The blunt face had a strangely shrunken look and it was the color of soiled dough. In his lifetime Sam had seen several bodies. Not one of the others had looked as dead. A flash bulb went off.

"He made it halfway to the car," Ricardo said. "The car was hidden off that dirt road up there, covered with brush. A 'scope rifle in it, and food and liquor. One of the boys is taking it in."

"Did you have to shoot him?"

Ricardo looked at him. "All we had to do was bring him down. We started finding blood halfway up the hill. A lot of it. Look at his clothes. One of your shots must have hit him, one of those last two you fired. Tore his right arm on the inside, just below the armpit. Tore an artery open. He climbed another three hundred feet before he ran out of blood."

Sam looked at the body. He had killed this man. He had turned this elemental and merciless force into clay, into dissolution. He searched through himself, looking for guilt, for a sense of shame. And found only exultation.

"I'll get him off the place as soon as I can," Ricardo said. "Stop by the barracks tomorrow if you can. I'll have the red tape ready for signature."

Sam nodded and turned and walked back to the house. He walked ten feet and stopped and turned and looked at them, and looked at the body, and said tonelessly, "Thanks."

He had intended to go upstairs, but a sudden weakness turned him toward a chair and he sat down listlessly. He could hear Jerry Jacks talking over the phone. He knew he should be annoyed at Jacks' sneaking into the house, but it didn't seem important. ". . . that's right. Dead. And it was Bowden did it."

It was Bowden did it.

When he felt strong enough he plodded up the stairs to wait there until Carol awoke, and hen he would tell her, and then he would leep, and then he would drive down and get he kids.

On Labor Day the Bowden family, with ommy Kent as the special guest, took the raditional last trip of the year on the Sweet ioux to the island.

It was a warm day with a fresh wind across he lake. The kids swam. Sam sat on a blanket n his swimming trunks, arms resting on his praised knees, can of beer and cigarette ir and. Carol was beside him.

"Baste me, ole friend," she said.

He put the beer can down, rested his ciga- ette on top of it, uncorked the lotion bottle, oured the liquid into the palm of his hand and troked it into the long clean brown lines of er back. One of the rarest of women, he ought. Woman of grace and spirit, pride nd delicacy.

Once again he thought of the nightmare ning that had so nearly happened to her. A uller spirit might have survived the crime ithout too much emotional damage, but arol never. It would have broken her ut- rly and forever. When he thought of the nar- owness of the escape, it made his eyes sting, nd it blurred the shape and pattern of her.

"Um," she said contentedly as he recapped the bottle.

"You are far too lazy to go in the water, I suppose." He threw the empty beer can into the lake and watched it move away, pushed by the wind. He watched Nancy eel up onto the stern of the Sweet Sioux and go off in a clean dive as lovely as music.

"Maybe I will swim. You've made me feel guilty with your insulting comments."

He looked at her tucking her hair into the white rubber cap. He said to himself, Moment of significance. On this day, at this hour and this minute, I know we have come out from under a dark cloud labeled "Cady." We are quite whole again. It's like recovering from a serious illness. All the world looks fresh and new. Everything looks special. I feel enormously alive.

He got up and followed Carol. They walked down to the water, hand in hand. Suburban father and suburban wife. A handsome, mild and civilized couple, with no visible taint of violence, no lingering marks of a dreadful fear.

He swam out with her, stopped and smiled lovingly at her, ducked her unexpectedly and violently, then swam for his life toward the stern of the boat, while the kids yelled for her to catch him. END

, as it pleases themselves. They dig a grave n the forest, and before sunrise they go to it ith their sons and friends, and some of them ven blow airs on a flute, and they lie down n it. They spread a goatskin over their face, nd as the sun comes up, the others fill in the arth. They will remain there, lying on the rave, without eating or drinking, with their ace upon the sod, till the sun is down, for ey do not believe that the old man in the rave will have died till then. Then they go ack, and eat and drink, having buried their ther, and think no more of it.

"Now it was said that they had buried, in is way, an old woman who came from a ountry in the East, and indeed I think that e was the grandmother of the miller's idow. Father Bernhard also heard of it, and as terrified that such ungodliness should be oing on in the parish.

"I said to him, 'It is the same to me hether, of the people, the living are buried r the dead choose to walk about. As to it appening in my forest, I do not like it, but any things go on in a forest which you may ot like.'

"Then he went to the people himself. 'Fa- er Bernhard,' they said to him, 'you settled eople chase us from one place to the other. ou fine us and whip us and put us in prison nd hang us. Do you now also grudge us a ttle earth to put into our mouths? Wait a ttle, and you will yourself come running fter us, to ask us to bury you for the sake of our peace.'

"Shortly after this, as it was that time of e year, they all went away, and I did not see ny one of them for a long time. Now you now, sir, that Father Bernhard, who was a ious man, was not well learned, and had ifficulty to read. From this time he began to ead all day, and to carry his book with him verywhere. One day, when I was out, it was e market day of Sarlat, and they were driv- g pigs to the fair, I found Father Bernhard t the side of the road, very pale and panting.

"'Who do you think, Claude,' he said, 'just assed me? The swine of the Gadarenes,' he aid, 'all the herd of them. Why, they may rise as well as other things in the Scripture, nd the people have sent them here. The devils re in them still, but they are tired by now of eing in swine, and are looking for someone enter into. It is hard that an old man like e shall have to be, now, night and day in e mountain, cutting myself with stones.'

"I said nothing to him; what can one an- wer to things out of the Holy Book?

"Then, again, a fortnight later, I met him. Will the people not be back soon, Claude?' e asked me. 'When will they be back?'

"That same week he was gone altogether, nd nobody saw him after that. And you will remember, sir, that as he had last been seen near the mill, they swept the seine for him in the millpond. There were then two little gypsy children who stood by. 'Sweep with a harrow,' they said." The old man stopped, and sighed.

"But, Claude," said his master, smiling, "they can have nothing to do with the misfortune of poor Father Bernhard. You tell me yourself that they were far away by that time."

"They were not here," the old man said with deep bitterness. "They would take care about that, the crafty devils. But what is she about at night, at Masse-Bleue, making the wheel turn, when she has no grain to grind?"

Seeing the young woman in the tartan frock coming down toward them, the men changed the subject of their talk, and the keeper again took off his cap.

"Am I interrupting an important debate?" she asked them, smiling. "Childerique sends me to ask you to take a glass of wine with us. You, too, Claude." She nodded to the old man.

They all walked up to where the young mother having finished the task of bathing her child, still blushing from the effort, was instructing the servants to spread a tablecloth upon the turf, and to bring wine and glasses. Out of the carriage the groom lifted baskets of cherries, deep orange speckled with crimson, and rich black, through the skin of which the red blood shone. The children had milk and cake upon a rug, a little way off, and were silent under the novelty of the treat.

The conversation of the party ran upon horses. They were all of them horse breeders and traders, and keen equestrians. Childerique had given up hunting; she had lost her own mother when she had been a baby, and would not have her children run any risk. But it had been a great sacrifice, and a horse was still to her what a bottle is to an old reformed drunkard; also, her team of horses was only a substitute. She was driving it today to break it in, in the hope of selling it well to a very rich neighbor, who had lately come to the district. The old nobility of the province was much taken up with this man, as with the first person capable of making a fortune whom they had never met face to face.

"Surely, Delphine," said Childerique to her friend, "you could sell Paribanu to Monsieur Tutein for me. You are his formulary in the manners of good society, and have only to tell him that a true gentleman is ever known by his off thill horse."

The young widow blushed. "If I really have the honor," she said, "of playing mentor to Monsieur Tutein's social Telemaque, I shall have more conscience than to drive him straight into the arms of Circe. You must ask him to your birthday party at Champmeslé, and do the bewitching yourself."

They began to discuss this party, which was to be given in honor of Childerique's twenty-fifth birthday, and was to take place in a week. Childerique got up with her husband and went off to look at the children, leaving the two others to discuss various festival arrangements, which were to be a surprise for herself.

On the way she squeezed her husband's arm a little and said, low, "There is a bite."

She was planning a match between her brother and her friend. That the young widow was five years older than the projected bridegroom she thought a fortunate circumstance. She was six years older than the boy herself, and would have disapproved and been jealous of any quite youthful feminine influence in his life. Her mind was running pleasantly on the prospect of presenting to the young couple a green set of Sèvres porcelain, which had come to Champmeslé nearly a hundred years ago. She came near to communicating her thought to her husband, but retained herself, suspicious of his laughter at her old manner of anticipating the course of events.

The nurse was teasing the little boy by pushing him back on the rug every time he tried to get up; the child was hiccuping with laughter, clear as a shrill little bell. At the sight of his father he gave such a shout of exultation as did, in the mast, Columbus' watchman at the first sight of a new continent. The young man lifted him onto his shoulders, and the child looked down majestically at the green world below him, and at his big sisters, suddenly so very small.

Children whose parents have been very much in love develop a fearlessness toward life unknown to the breed got in cold beds. They are indeed like those cherubs of old Relievi who are represented riding on lions, spurring the mighty lord of the desert with their little rosy heels, and pulling his dark mane. The dangerous powers of life have kept watch round their cradles; the lion has been their guardian and friend, and when they meet him again in life they recognize him, laughing, as their old playmate.

"What was Claude preaching about?" Childerique asked her husband. "I suppose it was of the gypsies."

"There are so many of them just now," said Philippe, "he wants us to chase them off the land, and tells me that Monsieur Tutein has done so on his estate."

"Yes, Monsieur Tutein," said she with disdain, "what does he know about them? Grandmama once told me that in 'ninety-three they hid grandpapa from the soldiers when he came back home to see his wife. At that time Monsieur Tutein's people were very likely with the troops of the mountain. When I was a little girl I often wished to be a gypsy child and to wander about with them. Did you never want that?"

"But I did it," said her husband, "when I was living in Canada, with my father. As a child, I was friendly with many of the red Indians, and went about with them for long whiles. They were good people, kind to me, and taught me many things. Sometimes these people remind me of them. It is curious, for instance, about that young woman of the mill. I knew an old Indian woman, whose tribe believed her to be a witch. She was a hundred years old, and hideous to look at. Still, those two are alike. I have wondered whether it is the brand, the witch's mark which they have in common. An old Indian told me that once a woman has turned to witchcraft there is nothing in the world that can turn her off it, not love, children nor virtue. I have wondered ——" He stopped.

"I know," said Childerique. "You have been told that old Udday, her father, once laid a curse upon my father and all his descendants. But my mother liked them." This was always the last word with her. Her piety to the memory of her dead mother tolerated no argument.

"And besides," she cried, "where is the curse on me? Where is the curse?" Laughing, she dragged down her little son from his father's shoulders, played with him and blew into his face. "Where is our curse?"

"Childerique," cried Delphine from her seat on the grass, "I must go back or I shall be too late. The two old sisters De Maré are coming to play cards, and I must pick up the abbé on my way to make a fourth."

The party broke up, first seeing Delphine off in her phaeton. From the entrance to the dense wood she waved her hand with the whip; her gay colors were swallowed up by the somber deep.

Childerique got herself and her family into the landaulet; she let the coachman drive the horses for the return journey. The little boy grew sleepy on his nurse's knees.

"Give him to me, Marie," said the mother.

No sooner was he seated in her arms than he dropped off to sleep, his dark curls—luminous as the black cherries that they had been served—toward her bosom. She became absorbed in the delight of the pressure of his firm little body against her own, and sat silent, thinking of the struggle she had had with her stepmother, before she got the old woman's consent to nursing her babies herself. What obstacles people do make for our happiness, she thought.

The two riders trotted on, a little behind the carriage, their horses prancing on the narrow road; they did not talk. The young boy, red-haired, tall and slim on his tall horse, was pushing his mount on impatiently, as if he could not stand this state of things one moment longer. Philippe had his eyes on the carriage, and that air of listening and keeping watch which rarely left him.

On his return to France from America nine years ago, his neighbors had been impressed and a little frightened by his new ideas and schemes of reform, but he had quite settled wn by now, and seemed to form himself e a ringwall round the little world of his mestic life. It had indeed taken him some e to get used to the abundance around him. eemed to him that he had done nothing but e to himself a lovely young girl of his ive province, and from that one step had ulted the richness of life on all sides, the ltiplicity of color and melody in his house d garden, the activity everywhere, laughter d crises of tears, the sweetness of young s and alternation of work and hopes, the ole solar system of Champmeslé.

He watched the figure of his wife, sunk in sing in the carriage seat. He recognized the ughtful mood which had come over her, wave motion of her being, following the thm of the moon like the tidal waves of sea. It was as if a weigh was being gathd grain by grain, within the depth of her, ancing down her vitality into a new calm d a deeper understanding. Sometimes she uld disappear from him altogether for a or two, but only to come back, radiant, from a flight into a distant world from ich she brought with her fresh flowers to rn her home.

e young master of Champmeslé himself had h an uncommon destiny.

He was born in Dordogne, but when he was en years old his father had gone away from country, and had taken him with him, to on an estate near Quebec, upon the river Maskinongé, which had been in his family a long time. The boy never quite knew t had driven his father into exile. His ther had died two years before.

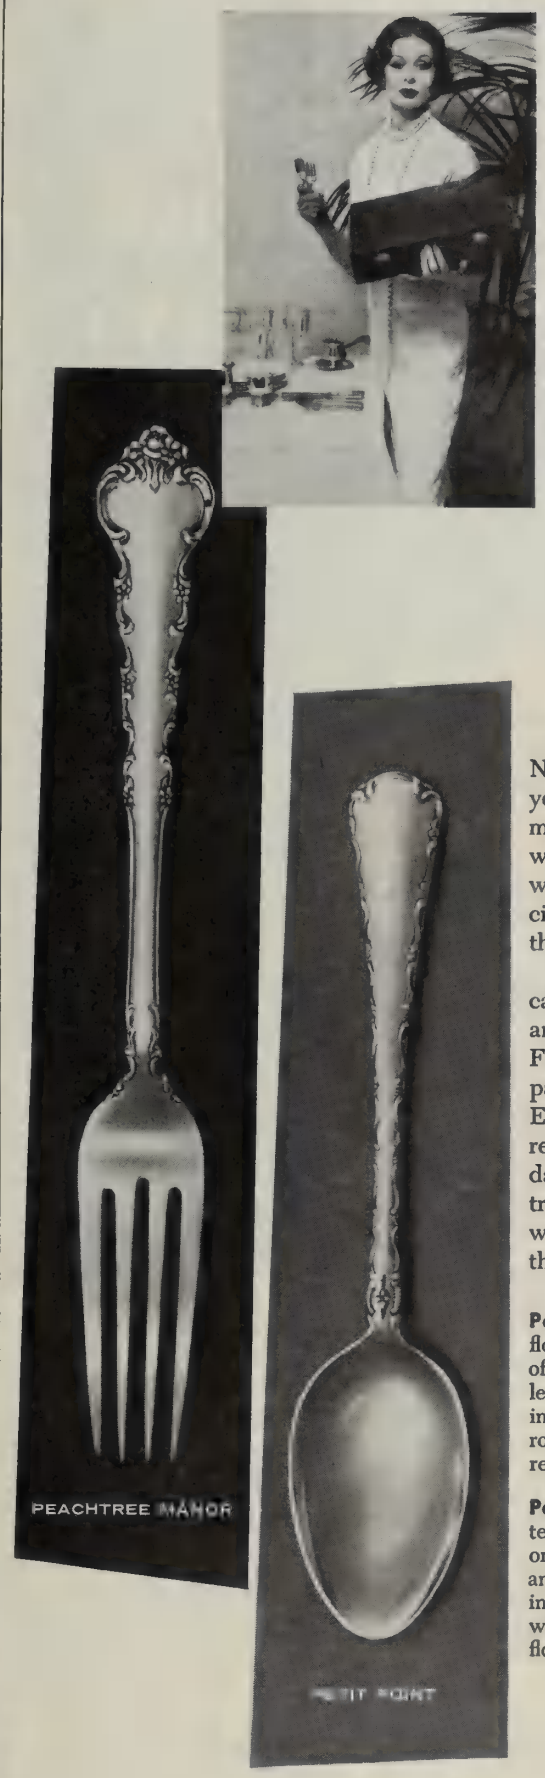
For some reason his father took up, in new country, the life of a hard-working ner, and left the interest on his capital to umulate in France, and to keep up and rove his estates there. Philippe was told t they were rich, but he never knew in ctice what it meant to be rich.

He became conscious of himself and of the ld in a rough new country. Still the old vince—these same hills and valleys, woods old towns which now encircled him—was h him during all his childhood, as God is r present to a child piously brought up. e names of the old places were on his her's tongue, and the boy would not forget w the rivers ran and the roads turned, what e the signs of the changing seasons, or w the old people on the farms were related ne another. The records of stags killed and ses bred in France were kept on the Cana- farm. Most often of all would come back name of Haut-Mesnil and of the people o lived there.

His boyhood, lonely in a strange country, in the company of a melancholy man, had ne all the same with rainbow radiance m a lost, a promised land.

ne after time in the course of these years father would take up the idea of going k to France. The life of the child then ected the terrible struggle within the soul he ordinarily collected, quiet man. He saw thrown off his balance, upset and stirred the bottom of his being. For weeks the ny would go on; the man would decide to nd give it up ten times within one night, or would imagine them already on the way, e up and find himself in the Canadian ne, and despair. These outbreaks became a rly returning rite, an equinoctial gale in existence of the boy. One thing he would ice: as soon as there was any plan of going k to France the names of Haut-Mesnil and inhabitants would disappear from the abulary of his father. Then, in the end, the od passed, always in the same way, and Baron de la Verandryé never went back France.

When his father fell ill, the conflict of his suddenly dissolved itself in his plans and es of his son's going to France when he self should be dead. During his last months talked much of all that the boy was to do re, with such gay hopefulness as Philippe never known in him. The boy would find feverish in his bed, waiting for his return nstruct him how to put out carp in a pond Champmeslé. On his last day his mind was swarming with the names of old servants and dogs; to the son listening it was just as if the world of Champmeslé were rushing out to meet him.



Six months after his father's death, when he had settled the affairs of their estate, Philippe started on his journey home.

He had his first real feeling of freedom at the sight of the ocean. But one moonlight night, when he was on the deck in the dark-brown, transparent shadow of the large sails, it was to him suddenly as if the cold, gray, wandering waters spoke to him, warning him not to go, but to turn back. The feeling did not last long, but he remembered it long.

On his return to France, for a time he forgot everything.

The promised land more than kept its promises. Strange as it was to him to travel toward his home, to meet, one after the other, the blue hills and rivers, and the towns, and to find them so much smaller than he remembered them—for in Canada the problem of distances had been one of the serious phenomena of life, but the French land all seemed to be one neighborhood and distance non-existent, and this from the first made everything dreamlike to him—conditions were soon, in a much stranger way, changed entirely. He was no longer acting himself, but was being received and handled by something stronger than he. Just as it had come to lift up his dying father, the country came out to meet him, put its arms round him and held him. He learned that his father had been dear to people here in a way which he would never himself have guessed; they talked of him with smiles and tears. A new picture of the lonely man was here forming itself to his son.

This extraordinary happiness of his first year in France was, even now, sometimes brought back to Philippe, unconsciously, in an old tune or a scent. And when he thus got the whole fullness of the nights and days of that year, of friendships, hunts, journeys, meals and dreams, distilled and in one draught, the strongest flavor within it was still that feeling of belonging to something, and of having been made one with a life outside himself, in which he had still a more perfect freedom than he had known before. It had the sweetness of a first union of love. Consciously he could never recall it, it had lasted too briefly.

In due time he also called at Haut-Mesnil. There he found things much changed, for the master of the house had died, his widow was a second wife, whom his father had never known, and the present head of the family, her son, was a boy of ten. The daughter of the first marriage, with whose name he was familiar, was in a convent at Pirigueux. But he was received there as kindly as everywhere, and in time, in spite of the place being so unlike the Haut-Mesnil of his childhood's dreams, he came to feel more at home there than in any other house. So much power is there in lifeless things, in houses, roads, trees and bridges. Also there was a particular influence at work in the place, to which, later on, he came to find a name.

From the countess he learned a thing which surprised him: namely, that the heads of the houses of Haut-Mesnil and Champmeslé had not been on friendly terms. This did not affect the benevolence of the countess toward him; in fact, it seemed that this lady had made it a line of conduct to take, in life, the opposite side from her husband. Thus she had taken, on her marriage, the side of her stepdaughter against her father, and even, when her own son appeared on the stage and was made much fuss about, against him. She did not come from Dordogne, but from the province of Geneva; she was a highly bigoted, dry woman, with little knowledge of the world or the heart, no imagination and no faculty for loving. Life was dull to her, and she welcomed, with a passionate gratitude, the few phenomena in it which were capable of awakening her imagination. Probably it was her grudge against her husband that he had never been able to do so—even her son, when he had once been born, had failed. For scandal she had no taste; the world of sentiment lay too far off her domain. Religion had often shown a fatal tendency to dry up under her hands, from the ecstasy which, upon the best of authorities, she had expected of it into sawdust of moral principle. But adventure she appreciated. When Philippe would talk to her little son of red Indians, of bear hunts or of canoe expeditions she would listen as spellbound as the child. Something of the picture of the little boy who had grown up, motherless, far from France, in the company of wild red-skinned men, struck her heart and brought out one of the rare little wells of feeling in it. Philippe found in the narrow-minded woman who could not love a rare talent for being a friend, which, toward him, lasted all her life.

Many things at Haut-Mesnil were explained by the strange luster which was still spread everywhere by the memory of the Countess Sophie, Childerique's mother. The remembrance of this beautiful young woman seemed to live in all the province, like an afterglow of her rich vitality. People talked about her as if she were still alive, and little tales of her grace and generosity were hurried upon him, as if he could not be accepted as a true child of the community until he shared this creed. He heard of her curious taste for disguise, so that she would, like a neat female Harun al-Rashid, become acquainted with the poor and outcast of the land in her maid's apron, even dressed up as a horse dealer's boy, for she was an exquisite horsewoman; and of her impulsive heart when, on finding a poor tenant's household lamenting a dead mother and a newborn baby, she had shifted her own little daughter to the arms of the nurse, and laid the forlorn child to her full breast. The present countess herself, who had never seen Madame Sophie, had a special feeling toward the frail figure, a mixture of admiration and pity. In Childerique, though she strove to graft into her the strictest principles of prudence, her true devotion went toward the imaginative, defying sides of her nature which recalled the dead woman.

When Childerique came from her convent she found the new young neighbor a persona grata of Haut-Mesnil, so much the friend of her little brother that to begin with she did not like him. Philippe afterward wondered whether the stepmother had not, before the girl's turn, planned—as much as she had it in her to plan anything in life—to unite sense and romance by marrying off her stepdaughter to the largest estate of the province as well as to the blood brother of the Mohicans. The heart of the young man needed no encouragement. He was prepared for love for this girl as a field plowed and harrowed, for the spring rain. Virginal and generous, Childerique seemed to him the incarnation of France and of all that he had dreamed of as a child. At times it was as if he had known her first, and as if the country was imitating the girl in sweetness and ease of heart. Now even had the young woman and the young man been scheming together skillfully, the prey would not have been easy for them to come up to.

Childerique was at this time intoxicated with her freedom. She had grieved as a child because she had not been born a boy; for the sake of her mother's honor, she was indignant that her stepmother should have accomplished the exploit which her beloved mother had failed to achieve. She was also at this period of her life troubled by being unusually tall for her age. Toward both these worries she took up the same attitude; she seemed to feel that as the truth could not be concealed, the world might as well have it point-blank. On this account she carried herself erect in her full height and also allowed herself the full freedom of being a girl, following all her own whims and frankly keeping from the society of males. In spite of her conventual education she was a Diana of Dordogne, a kind of deity, but with bow and arrows. She might well, had she seen bathing in her favorite forest pool, and Actaeon approached, sweaty from the hunt, congratulating her on her choice of a bathing place, have invited him to join her in a swim. But had she found him spying on her secret he would not have been behind the goddess in posing her fierce hounds on him. She had o desire to be desired, and her woman's ingdom of longing, rapture and jealousy eemed to her all too vast; she did not want to ake up the scepter at all. Like a young stork hich considers that it runs very well, and oes not care to fly, she had to be lured into er element. But once in it, she gave proof of reat powers. After his first kiss and words of ve, she fluttered up audaciously into flight; was in their honeymoon an ecstatic, easy aring, and as the children were conceived nd born a succession of majestic wing strokes.

They were married in the month of June, nd Philippe took his young wife by her own am of four horses, which were his wedding resent to her, the dreamlike easy distance om Haut-Mesnil to Champmeslé. The house which he brought her was inferior to her d home, for the manor of Champmeslé had en burned down dur- g the Revolution. The mily had since lived in long white house, for- erly the habitation of e inspector of the es- te. But it lay very ely, surrounded by the rraces, gardens and oods of the old châ- au, and within it was chly furnished with oice old things and steful modern fur- ture.

Up under the roof of is house there was a rge room, light in elf, but darkened by utters. Upon the day- ek of his wedding the ung husband, a little dy with happiness, aming about in the use of which many rners were still un- own to him, came up re, and on finding the ace filled with old fur- ure, mirrors, pictures, oks and papers, sat wn for half a lazy ur, going through old ters in the chiaroscuro the room, and scat- ing them round him. ally he was looking some trace of the le boy Philippe who d wandered about in same house twenty rs ago, and might ve left a reflection in ne dim and dusty old king glass, into which one had since gazed.

Out of an old tortoise-shell box, which ened by the touch of a spring, a packet of ers came into his hand. They were love let- s, written by a lady to her lover, by Childe- ue's mother to his father. Afterward he re- mbered how he had, after the first glance, up to destroy them, when his eyes had been ght by his own name.

The young mistress wrote: "Your clever l adorable little Philippe, who, when I sat h him on the garden seat, and had closed eyes to think of you, poked his little finger o my face and said, 'Light your eyes, dame.'"

Here was the child of Champmeslé then, no ger lonely; a young woman had sat with n in a garden, had smiled at him, and re- ted his little sayings in a letter to her lover.

e read all the letters through, only once, he found later that he knew many passages them by heart, and could have passed an mination on the correspondence of the d lovers. The last of them was a crumpled of paper, unlike the others in form as well. an: "Dear Baron de la Verandryé: Just a rd. I am sorry for what I said to you yester- . The bearer, the gypsy Udday, has got message and will give it to you correctly; too long for me to write, as I am not well. od-by, good-by."

Philippe looked at the date; it was the day of Childerique's birth. This letter was written to deceive anybody into whose hands it might fall; the lovers had quarreled, and unable to bear the burden of their disagreement at this moment, Sophie had sent the gypsy with a verbal message, and the note as a credential.

As soon as he understood the sense of the letters, Philippe got up and locked the door. It was as if he had found his father in here, defenseless and exposed to danger.

Here, then, was the central point and the heart of his world, even from childhood, and of his father's wanderings, exile and death, run to earth at last in the attic of Champmeslé. This sweetness and this fire had hurled people to and fro across the ocean. He looked round him, so strongly did he feel the presence of the man in the grave over the sea, and the woman in the mausoleum of Haut-Mesnil.

How was it possible that he had not known till now? His heart was squeezed by pain as he thought of the comfort that he might have given his father had he only understood that when he said "France" he meant "Sophie."

He made a heap of all the letters, struck a light and watched them flame up and come to ashes upon the cold fireplace.

So Childerique was his father's child. There was no doubt about it; the young impassionate mother had informed her lover of the happiness and danger, and had come back to it many times. It seemed natural enough, and that rare sympathy and feeling of home which he had with her was real and sprang from a source deep in their blood. He had had the sensation, when they had laughed and jested together, of being with someone whom he had known well and loved all his life, and now he understood that too: he had then been playing with his father as a child.

He smiled at the thought that he and she were works of the same artist. He had met, in his father's nature, a deep conflict between his sense of duty and the strong and wild inclinations of the heart. He himself was then a product of the man's conscience, his respect of, and resignation to, outward forces, but Childerique was what his father could do when he was left free, where he wanted to be.

Suddenly the thought of Childerique filled the room so completely that it drove away all the shadows, and he rose to go to her when he remembered that he had locked the door. He was struck by a great wave of terror. It seemed to him that he had separated himself from her forever. That gray and cold ocean upon which he had looked down from the ship, he had laid it between him and the young wife downstairs whom he had lately held in his arms, and had left arranging bouquets for their home.

Frightened to death, he could not bear the silence. "Father!" he cried, his hands to his head, and in a moment, as there was no answer: "Sophie—Madame Sophie, what have I done?"

Why had they not told him, but let him walk straight into this misery? Still, he knew now that his father had told him, had he only understood. But, he thought again, the day before his wedding a bridge had given way as he rode across it, and he had been in danger of his life. Why had the dead people not helped him there, and let him die?

WISH

By INGEBORG KAYKO

If I could wish upon my wedding ring
I'd pray it circle back until one day,
No feast or holiday, any, warm or gray,
Begun in clouds or breaking clear, as long
As it were one of ours and far away,
Before the nations in their sundering
Had broken in our common clock the spring
And dealt us sunset with the sun still high.
Then we saw dawn and noon as with two eyes,
Dusk happened to us both, and when night came
Each knew the other heard her footfall too.
If I could have my single wish, I'd prize
One more sweet everyday, full of the same
Hours for both of us, all striking true.

He sat for a long time in the room, to make up his mind. Had it been the week before, he thought, he could have told her, or he could have gone away without ever telling her. Now he could do nothing. In the end, before he left the room again, he had sealed his mouth and his heart forever; she should never know that anything had been changed between them. He thought, It would bring down all the world around her, the sacred memory of her dead mother, her strong faith in honor and virtue, her joy and hope about the future. Was it not then for him to guard her against such disaster? In his heart he knew well that all these reasons were of no account, and that the true motive for his silence was that he could not, he would not suffer her to think with horror of his embrace.

His longing for her, as he got up, was so strong that his arms and hands ached. Let it be as it will, he thought. Let them even separate our souls forever, if it be as they tell us. Our bodies they shall not separate at all.

As life went on at Champmeslé during the following seven years, and his existence grew up on all sides, this same thought was ever with him. Their home became, round Childerique, a little world of its own, through all of which one line and spirit ran. The horses and dogs, the servants of the house, the furniture and the books of the library, the lilacs on the terrace, the silhouette of the roofs as you came home late in the dusk, and the tunes that she played—all belonged to one another, and were each of them part of a greater whole. If they were scattered by another revolution, or if, their earthly career finished, they were to meet again in another world, wherever two or three of them were gathered together they would recognize each other and cry, "Hail, there is one more of us. We, too, were there. We, too, were part of Champmeslé."

When the first two children were born, he was glad that they were daughters. He thought that it would be wrong should a child of incest carry forth the name of La Verandrye. After the birth of his first little girl he had even gone to their old doctor to ask him whether there was any sure way of deciding the sex of children beforehand.

The old man laughed at him. "Oh, Monsieur le Baron," he said, "you are too impatient. Do not refuse to plant us a few roses at Champmeslé, for the joy of the province, before you graft the oak."

Childerique herself had been on the watch for any sign of disappointment in her husband, but she thought that the loveliness of the children had conquered their father's heart. When the boy was born she made all the house and land of Champmeslé clap their hands at this master stroke of hers.

She had wanted the child named first after his father and then after hers. To him neither choice had seemed seemly; he thought, Let each of the dead men have that peace of the grave now, which they have more and less deserved.

He often wondered what would happen to her should she come to know the truth now. He imagined that she would go into a convent; she would have to throw herself into the arms of heaven for her salvation. It was not her actual fate either which took up his thoughts, but the transformation which, at a word, all her world would undergo. He had seen grass fires, and the black and wasteland which they leave behind them; her flowering world would come to look like that. When he had been a boy he had been the friend of an old Indian horse trader, who had assured him that he was, at the very same hour as he was trading horses in the market place of Quebec, even as well, in the strong and shaggy shape of a timber wolf, hunting and sleeping in the mountains. Thus, he thought, the white house of Champmeslé was even at this time at once the pride and refuge of her heart and to her mind a house of crime against the law of God, a place of shame. The three children, playing under her eyes on the terrace, were both the flowers and the crown of a proud, wild race and, more terrible than the cubs of the timber wolves, nameless offspring of dishonor. And he himself—like his friend Osceola, who, while he was grooming his sleek horses and tying up their tails, was also trotting upon a trail in the woods or sitting in the snow and howling at the terrified mares and foals—he was at the same time the head of the corner of her happiness, and her enemy, the destroyer of it all.

In the beginning of their married life his consciousness had made him a little unsteady in his relations with his wife. He would leave her then, to come back begging for her love, as if he thought that they were soon to be separated for life. Childerique, who had no means of comparing him to other young men in love, took this as the normal expression of a man's passion: it did not affect her: her strength and resilience of heart could have stood out against a heavier weight thrown at it. Sometimes she felt a slight compassion for him because he was still a stranger to many things which seemed to her foundation stones of existence. He was at home neither in the old nonsense rhymes of the nursery nor in the divine service of church, and he hardly remembered his first Communion.

One trait in the nature of his wife made Philippe wonder if she had in her an instinct which knew more than she did herself. Though she was such a devoted wife, radiant with love, her feelings seemed to be more those of a sister or comrade than of a woman in love, as if she knew his love to have been born with him, and to be hers by right of nature. Many women, he was aware, will buy their supremacy over their lovers at the price of much self-denial, and will submit to servitude through all the hours of the day to hold, within one hour of the night, triumphantly, the highest power of life and death. This, in a woman, had always made him uncomfortable; he distrusted both the servitude and the triumph. Childerique would be prepared to buy his appreciation of her as a housewife or a mother, and his admiration of her wisdom, justice and virtue, at the cost of her greatest efforts, and of a good deal of persuasion. For his desire and adoration, which were her happiness, she would give nothing at all, as if holding that within their sphere there can be neither sale nor purchase.

But with the young lord of Haut-Mesnil, six years younger than herself, she showed all the attributes of a passionate and jealous mistress. She could not live without his adoration, and would humor and coax him into it; she never ran short of coquetries and artful flattery. She was vain about his appearance and about her own when he was near, and melancholy when he was melancholy, like one of his own dogs. And with him she was also capricious, zealous of attention, hurt by negligence and ever on her outlook for a rival, be it only one of his friends from school. She rarely gave her husband any caress on her own accord, but she would take trouble to keep near the boy, fondling and petting him, holding his hands and playing with his fingers or running her own fingers through his red locks.

III

There was in the forest a large oak near which the roads divided and went off, the one to Haut-Mesnil and the other to Champmeslé. Here Childerique had her carriage stopped to take leave of her brother.

But the boy rode up to her and said, "I will dine at Champmeslé if I may. I have something to talk to you about." She smiled at him very tenderly.

After dinner the brother and the sister walked up and down the terrace. Her husband watched them from the window of the library as he went through his papers and letters. He was starting in a day or two on his annual trip to La Rochelle, where he was to arrange the business of his Canadian property, and this time meeting some people of his from over there. A letter from Canada, received the same day, and not yet read, was on his table before him. The couple on the terrace walked into and out of his range of sight. Childerique had let down her hair, still moist from the children's splashings. It was very thick and soft, and wafted round her neck and shoulders as she moved. Philippe remembered having seen pictures of deities with hair of snakes, rays of sun or zig-zagged lightning, and he could well believe the personality of the bearer forcing itself thus even into the hair. These dark tresses, dead stuff which you might cut off or burn without her feeling it, just because at one point they were attached to her head, would twist, shine and fill the air with fragrance. As she turned and came toward him, the sun behind her, her head was wrapped in a dark cloak, within which red fires were smoldering.

The boy was silent for a while, gazing not at her but far away over the landscape. In the setting sun it was filled with strong and live colors, the shadows lengthening across it on all the eastern sides of slopes and forests. The glinting river wound along in the distance, in and out between groups of trees and rushy margins. The sister had picked a rose and from time to time touched her lips with it.

Suddenly the boy stopped and spoke. "Remember this afterward," he said: "I need not have told you. I have told no one else, nor shall I do so. But one time, long ago, out in the forest, I said to you that I should probably always tell you everything that I was doing. In three days' time I am marrying the miller's widow at Masse-Bleue."

His sister made big laughing eyes up at him over her rose, confident of some jest. On meeting the ice-cold, bloodshot eyes of an antagonist, she stood dead still and the color of her face slowly deepened to dark crimson; her eyes even seemed to water from the heat of the fire on her forehead and cheeks. It was as if, on finding her brother murdered and plundered in a dark forest, her first feeling should have been that of shame on seeing him naked. Soon her silence became intolerable to him.

"Yes," he said, "this is Udday's curse. We are lost. But I am free to be lost, if I choose, whatever all the world, whatever you say of it."

It hurt her mortally that he should speak of all the world and of her in the same breath; still she dared not give in to her emotion, lest she should fall down dead, when she could not afford to fall, for she was standing up here to fight him.

"Why," she said, gazing straight into his pale, agonized face, "are you doing this?"

Her question seemed to calm him. So many times had he explained his whims and difficulties to her, to get her influence in their home on his side, that her words were to him like a bugle call, which he could not disobey. After a moment he sighed deeply and spoke to her very slowly and brokenly.

"You know," he said, "that people live on the moors and the wasteland where the vipers are. There is not one of them who has not been bitten by vipers at some time. They have become immune to the poison; not only do they not die from it, as we do, it harms them not at all. You know, Childerique, how frightened I have been, all my life, of vipers and snakes—even now, when I set eyes on one of them I feel as if I should die. Well, I should like to be invulnerable to their bites too. I will be with the people who cannot be hurt by vipers" after a moment he added, "who play with them, and make them dance."

It was her weakness that she understood him so well. His mother, she thought, would not have grasped the meaning of a single word he was saying; she would have met him with an absolute, heroic lack of understanding which would have swept all he had said into nothingness. Her own fatal insight into his soul was like a weight round her neck. Still she disdained pretending not to understand. She was aware that all their common past was behind his words. They brought up a swarm of pictures of him and of herself, out on travel in the woods, in those moors or marshes of which, he spoke, where they had strayed against the orders of his mother and their nurses. They had seen vipers there, and ha

Ask any WOMAN

By Marcelene Cox

The best time to have children is when you are old enough to spank them and young enough to be able to.

Overheard: "What she thinks of she's already said."

Money saved for a rainy day too often provides a fancy umbrella for someone else.

A recruit doing K.P. arrived late in the kitchen one morning and hurriedly warmed up yesterday's coffee. Expecting the worst, he was surprised to hear, "Best yet! How'd you make that coffee? Tasted just like my wife's."

Mother feeding child: mind over splatter.

For parents: If at first you don't succeed, ask your children; they'll tell you how.

When one parent sides with a child against the other parent, the balance of nature is disturbed.

Adolescence: that period when children revert to the two-o'clock feeding.

The experts have managed to furnish a house with everything unscratchable, unstainable and unbreakable—except the children.

The jet pilot who fired into the blue and was subsequently injured by his own shot has nothing on what happens to many a parent after directing advice toward an adolescent.

For sheer excitement, there is nothing to equal living through the first few months in a new home, waiting for the house to reveal its true character.

The person who learns to rise to an emergency in early life can sleep longer later on.

Perhaps the farmer really had a point when he was in no hurry to have water piped into his house because "I don't like to have things too handy around here—want to keep the kids on their feet."

I owe so many recipes for cooking and living to my beloved Aunt Delphine, who cherishes my interests so much that she once took the paring knife away from me in my own kitchen because my peelings were "too thick."

The young mother's back carries her burdens like the brittle walnut limb, the old mother's back like a willow limb.

A citizen's first session on a jury may be a shocking experience. He is likely to hear, "I'd believe him" (doctor, lawyer, officer) "before the defendant"; or, "Let's be lenient. After all, it is his first murder."

It often seems that the more pans a woman has the less she bakes, and the more tools a man has the less he makes.

One family seems to be rearing the son to become adapted to life in this brave new world: he earns his allowance by plugging in and unplugging the toaster.

been looking for wolves, which they knew to have lived there many years ago. They had been out in search of other things as well, of the dangers and horrors of the world. She had then egged the delicate boy on, indignant of his timidity, and she had triumphed when in the end she had called forth his foolhardiness. Their dangers had caused her great delight. But on what wild track was her little dog now running? She could not follow him, and she would not let him get away.

"Ah, indeed," she cried, "you talk like a man! It is the right thing for the lord of Haut-Mesnil to go to the people of the moors, to be taught to make vipers dance, to be taught witchcraft and treachery. It was thus that you went away, in the old days, to learn the ways of Turks and infidels, and left the women to guard your land. But what about us? Might we not also want to try the taste of poison, to sleep in the woods at night?" She was surprised at her own words; they rushed to her lips on their own. What was she saying?

"Might we not also," she went on, "marry, at our pleasure, someone who could make vipers dance? But we did not do so. We did not forget the honor of our houses when you went away. There is not one, no not one, of the women of Haut-Mesnil who has disgraced their name, the name of our father. Is it forever, then, the task of the women to hold up the houses, like those stone figures which they call caryatids? And are you now, lord of Haut-Mesnil, going to pull down all the stones of our great house, upon your own head, and upon mine, and the heads of all of us?"

He looked at her with a strange, cold and hard curiosity. "What about you?" he repeated. "You, women of the great houses, who are holding up the houses upon your arms? You believe, mama and you, that you are the finest things in all the world; but then it is, perhaps, easier to make fine things out of stone than in flesh and blood."

Childerique drew in her breath in a long deep sigh. It was easier to her to hear herself, in his mouth, compared to his mother than, as before, to all the world, for she loved her stepmother, and had great respect for her.

"You curse us when we leave you, you say," the young man went on, "but what have you got to do with us, when you can never get your arms down? You know what you want; but what do we want? No one thinks of that. Father never liked mama; how could he, when she was made out of stone, a caryatid, as you say, on the house of Haut-Mesnil? Why should I want more stones, a son of stone, with a heart of stone, which you must break with a hammer, and throw on the road? A weight, that's what you want to give us, always a weight. The devil take it!" he cried, having worked himself into a childish fury. "If the loveliest things in the world be made of stone, we must be free to go and play with those that are less lovely."

She was as furious as he was, and it seemed to her that some huge black shadow, of such depth as she had never known, was stealing upon her from all sides. But she spoke calmly. "When you were a baby," she said, "and we were out in the forest together, I watched Rose-Marie nurse you, and when the milk ran from the corner of your mouth I wished that I had been grown up like her, and able to nurse you myself. Now I think it would have been better had I forced the juice of gall apples into your little mouth, so that you should never have grown up to shame us. How have you come to turn from all our old ways like this? What has the mill witch," she cried out, "given you, so that you must forget me?"

"Who?" he asked, as if he had forgotten what they had been talking about.

She stared back at him contemptuously. "The mill witch," said she.

As if his thoughts were, by her words, forced back to a resting place, his eyes fell, and slowly his distorted face was smoothed out, as if someone had kept stroking a hand over it. "I do not know," he said, "but she knows."

The darkness and the pain were now closing all round the sister. "Let us go away together, you and I," she cried. "We will sleep in the marshes, we will walk on the moors. Shall we not, in time, become immune, we two, to the vipers' poison? Come."

He stood straight up and looked at her for a moment. He sighed deeply. "Childerique," he said, "do you always dream of me?"

"Dream?" she asked. "No."

"No, you do not," said he, with deep, bitter emotion. "But I, you see—it is only in the mill, in my dreams, that you have never been. When I dream of the mill, you are never there. I have gone to the mill, I chose it for myself, now it is too late to go back. Now it is too late for you and me to go together. I wish, now," he went on very slowly, "that you would never think of me again."

For a second her knees, within her voluminous skirt, swayed, as if she meant to throw herself down upon them to him, but her movement took another direction; she cast herself toward him, folding his slim figure in her arms with the energy of a protecting mother or of a drowning woman, looking with radiant eyes into his face.

"Oh, my brother, my dearest love," she said, "I will never let you go. Do you not think that I know more than you, that I can also open up a new world to you? Oh, I can teach you dances too, darkness, magic too." While she spoke she lifted her hand and pressed up his chin.

The boy turned so deadly white under he touch that he frightened her. He drew back step, and with strong hands he freed himsel of her.

"No, do not do that," he said. "Simkie ha held me, holds me, like that."

The sister stood where he had left her, a white as he. She thought, That was the las time that I ever held him in my arms.

Suddenly he walked away.

At that moment a strange and terrible thing happened to her, which she had never experienced. She saw herself, clearly, as with her own eyes. She saw her own figure standing before the house, with her loosened hair; she ever

Ted Nadler won a total of $152,000. But when he furnished his house, he had hit a TV plateau of only $16,000, had sunk most of his winnings into a down payment on the bungalow in University City. "So we bought budget-priced furniture," but even so, he estimates, equipping the home came to "about $9000 . . . luckily I went on winning more around that time." From Clara's point of view, the new possessions are all a happy bonus. "We enjoy our home, so I figured we were always wealthy in that way," she explains. Now with all new equipment, she felt she needed new housekeeping techniques.

The apartment the Nadlers lived in before had been old, dark and small. Clara used to hang her clothes out on a line each morning, hand-scrub worn linoleum floors, coax a chipped and chugging refrigerator into action, push a carpet sweeper. The bungalow they have now is "another world." Its floors are tile or newly carpeted, and kitchen equipment came with the house, including a dishwasher, a garbage-disposer unit.

Ted did all the buying and Clara and the boys agreed to anything he chose—for the most part blond woods, pale upholstery, plastic surfaces. She doesn't drive, and St. Louis' shopping centers are out of walking distance. "So we drove to the store together, bought for cash—we don't want to go into debt."

But now Clara finds herself unsure of the tools she needs to maintain her home's good looks. Visiting the JOURNAL Workshop to see how we housekeep and what tools we use here, she came primed with quiz questions all her own.

"I'm ready to give up on our rug—it picks up every mark—what can I do?"

Here Clara examines small rug samples; later compares soiling on large sections laid where many feet tramp in the dirt.

The new rug is light gray viscose. Ted's solution: cut the traffic of visitors and in-laws through the house! But Clara is sociable, thinks a rug should be too. Up to now she has tried to clean spots with detergents and soap powders and, with no luck, "started to wonder if I should put bleach in the water."

Our answer: When a rug is in a sad state, it is really worthwhile to have a professional cleaner take over, but the news is that you can ask him to use a special preparation to retard soil. When the rug is ready to face life anew, you can go on using a protective solution at home. Only recently on the market, this solution cleans and adds a soil-repellent to the rug at the same time. We showed Clara samples of rug swatches we had treated in our Workshop and then subjected to wear tests. The part of the rug to which we had applied protective solution had stayed bright after six weeks' heavy walking. The untreated half was contrastingly marked and soiled. She decided to try the protection in her own home. And in the way of Monday-morning quarterbacking, we all agreed that the really best protection was to buy a rug that was soil-retardant to start with. Many are on the market now, treated with chemicals in the manufacturing process. When the gray rug is ready for replacement Clara plans to look for one of the treated types.

"Don't you honestly think a dishwasher takes too much time?"

In a Workshop kitchen, Vickie Harris shows how a dishwasher makes short work of after-meal cleanup.

"By the time I scrape and rinse the plates," Clara told us, "I think I might as well do it by hand."

Don't rinse, we advised, unless you do all your dishes once a day, in which case it's best not to let food harden. Many homemakers follow that system. But all we do after each meal is to scrape plates lightly with a rubber spatula.

We find the dishwasher a tremendous work saver. Just be sure the water heat is 140° F. and a special dishwasher detergent is used. We load the bottom rack first, then the top, put in the silver as is, turn it on. The process takes only minutes and a whole tableful of dishes is washed and dried while we turn to another chore. Clara practiced with the spatula, and agreed that rinsing in the sink was unnecessary and could be eliminated from now on.

"The dryer is one of my favorite appliances. I don't care if it rains!—but how do you keep nylons from needing ironing?"

A secret of success with a dryer is demonstrated by Hazel Owen.

Clara, a conscientious housekeeper, was doing extra work ironing synthetics she overdried. A good rule: take everything out of the dryer while still a little damp before creases are set. They will dry as they are flipped and folded. Nylons or other synthetic garments can finish their drying on hangers, may need touch-up with an iron, but very little. Since the Nadler boys' new play shirts are mostly iron-free fabrics, Clara can save herself chores—and actually get longer wear from her fabrics—by setting the dryer cycle accordingly.

The young master of Haut-Mesnil rode s pace I shall be home in three quarters of an r, and drew in his reins. He saw before him long crimson drawing room, and his ss-stitch to welcome him. He blew the air ough his nostrils and turned his horse from road to a narrow path which ran through woods; after half an hour's ride it brought n out in the open, and to the moors.

He rode slowly now, down the slope from the forest to the open land, first through a thicket of nettles, raspberries and crane's-bill, then through the deep undergrowth of bracken that crushed under his horse's hoofs. The sound of the breaking branches and the strong and bitter smell went to his head and heart; it seemed to him that this was his fate: to crush and destroy everything. As he got out, the wide stretch of moor lay before him.

The sun was just setting; the air was filled with clear gold. The heather was not yet in flower, but the long hills had in their somberness a sweet promise of bloom. Along over the dark moor ran a floating line of fine golden dust that was the dry grass flowering in the wagon track across the dark land.

Into the head of the boy, riding on in deep thought, ran the often playfully repeated sentence of his old Swiss tutor about him: "Homo non sum, at omnium humanum ad me alienum est." He wondered what it was that these human people named human. It seemed that there was a curse upon him—of human beings loving him, and claiming love from him in return, when he could not, would not love! He thought of his mother, ever hoping for some richness of life through him and his love of her. Of his friends at school, who had liked him and wanted him to like them. He was sorry for them all. But all this love—it was like the cravings of vampires, with their large wings, asking for blood and offering, with deep sighs, their own thick hot blood in return.

He rode alongside a long slope that ran from north to south, and was suddenly struck by seeing, upon a lower parallel hill, east of him, his own shadow and that of his horse, accompanying him as he rode, upright, huge and long—a giant horseman stretching himself as far as he could over the land.

God, he thought, O God, save the world from me.

The sun went down, and the hills that had blushed in its last slanting rays in a soft shine of grayish purple suddenly cooled and darkened, like steel withdrawn from the furnace; the world became indescribably somber and severe. Immediately after, an owl flew past him on noiseless wing strokes.

He tried to follow its flight in the glass-clear air. He remembered the joy which the sight of the big night bird always caused to the heart of Childerique. "I count that a great stroke of luck, a great happiness, to see an owl," she had said to him. He had asked her if she believed that the birds were omens of happiness. "I do not know," she said. "I think it a great happiness, in itself, to see them."

Just as he was thinking of this, his ear caught the sound of music, the notes of a flute, played at a long distance. His face changed. He turned his horse and rode down the track of live gold dust, now extinguished, toward the mill of Masse-Bleue.

Down here he had soon to ride through long milk-white stripes of mist, which rose from the damp meadows near the river. Below them the sward was still bright green. In the midst of a grass field a gate rose straight before him, dark in the dark. He did not care to get off to open it, but made his horse walk back a little, and, hurrying it on, he jumped the gate. It was a risky thing to do in the dusk; the horse had become wild by it; he himself grew warm and comfortable from his success. A strong smell of marsh whortleberry and bog myrtle contracted his nostrils. The stars came out one by one.

IV

The lady of Champmeslé came out of the shade of the forest to the white road, and walked on to the bridge leading across the lock of the millpond to the mill. The smell of running water and water weeds was fresh and quelling here. The hour of noon was absolutely still, and the heat heavy as lead; the whole landscape was somber with it as if seen through a pair of dull blue glasses. Even the mountain-high white clouds had a sort of dusk in them. Childerique paused on the bridge. Nobody knew that she was here, and that thought itself was inspiring to her; this had not happened to her since she had been married. She had been in such uproar all night, now, if she hesitated it was from neither fear nor irresolution, but just to gain her breath. She had been filled with wrath, and had started from the high terrace of Champmeslé like one of those great white clouds, sweeping down with thunder and lightning upon the mill of Masse-Bleue. But this dead silence, these smooth rapid waters rushing away under her feet, were they hers or the miller's widow's?—and with whom were they in league?

The miller's widow opened the door of the millhouse, and appeared on the threshold as if she had been expecting her. She was wiping her round arms, that had flour on them, on her skirt. The women of her tribe, Childerique knew, often smile very sweetly and coaxingly, but laugh out only in triumph or amorousness.

The gypsy was eighteen years old, rounded in all her lines, singularly light of movement. She was barefooted and had on nothing more than a shirt and a closely folded, faded blue cotton skirt. Although both married and widowed, she, here in her own house, wore her thick hair in two pigtails; between them at the nape of her neck a coarse tatter of hair bristled out, a sign of strength.

At the nearness of this strong and fresh young body Childerique's fury came back; she felt in her hands the desire to seize the rich, round, amber-colored throat and to strangle this creature who defied her; and a

"Can I get kitchen or bathroom floors really clean without scrubbing on hands and knees?"

e don't believe in hand and knee work any more and never it ourselves. There are so many tools now to save us from crouched scrubbing our mothers and grandmothers knew. r cleaning, we use long-handled brushes or mops of the tomatic wring-out kind, or we use an electric floor polisher th a scrub-brush attachment. Then after rinsing and drying, wax—again with a long-handled applicator or an electric xer. The bathroom floor needs a nonskid wax rather than slippery kind. But once you've finished, the wax takes the ar, and dirt can't penetrate. The only cleanup needed is an casional wipe with a long-handled sponge mop.

"We've never had a cuum so we wouldn't know one from another. What kind is best?"

n our Workshop homelike ting Clara tried cleaners of various types with her own needs in mind.

She couldn't make up her mind. "Ted asked me if I wanted one to replace the carpet sweeper. I dn't know what to choose."

Try them out, we suggested. We use both upright and tank d canister types in our Workshop, and Clara experimented. enerally we find the upright best for carpet cleaning because uses both suction and a rotating brush, while the tank and nister types clean chiefly by suction. On the other hand, the nk or canister is more compact to store. To summarize, we'd y that if the cleaner is to be used mainly for carpeting, the right is a good choice. Tools are available and on the newest odels are easy to attach. If much of the housework will be ncentrated above the floor—cleaning blinds, dusting, drawg soil from shelves and radiator crevices, for example—then e tank or canister gives splendid results. In any case, a cuum insures more cleanliness than a carpet sweeper because its pulling power. Clara decided she liked both vacuum pes, leaned slightly to the upright design and tried out all the tachments. Her favorite machine automatically shifts to high d creates more suction when attachments are used. The tool r cleaning Venetian blinds alone, she thought, would save ours of handwork she now puts in.

"They say that what you don't have you don't miss. Now that I own a garbage disposer, I couldn't do without one. Is there anything I shouldn't put in it?"

We agree that a garbage grinder in a sink is a modern sanitation wonder. It shreds waste, pulverizes ven chicken bones and eggshells and flushes them away. On ur don't list: don't put in any tin, metal, glass, china, plastic, ottle caps, oyster and clam shells, string, feathers, paper, or e rubber bands that come around vegetables. It can handle lmost any food items, although some models vary on such ems as peach pits and corncobs and it's wise to check the nstruction book. We also find it a help to cut grapefruit and range halves so they don't bounce around. Our do rule is to agger any bulky loads so the unit won't have to handle too uch at a time. By our records, its operation costs only pennies month.

"In St. Louis we have so much dust and dirt coming through the windows. Is there any way to keep the curtains clean?"

We'd use vacuum attachments to remove dust from both curtains and draperies. Since Clara likes organdy curtains for the bedroom, we suggested she ask about new curtains made of treated fabrics that repel dust. These new fabrics also wrinkle less in the washing, and make ironing easier.

"I love antiques—except antique refrigerators. Is there a special way to take care of a new one?"

Is she pleased with her new pale pink refrigerator? She's delighted. "It's my Christmas, New Year's and Mother's Day all in one." Ted bought it after Clara had coped for years with old models that developed motor trouble. Now that she has a new one that defrosts automatically, she will have very little maintenance work to contend with. The only work on a refrigerator: inner cleaning, which we do whenever it seems needed with a hot soapy-water-and-baking-soda mix. Any dirt mark on the outside can be removed with a creamy kitchen wax of the kind that cleans and polishes at the same time. You can use these waxes on either pastel or white surfaces.

"When I see a spot on the walls I scrub it with cleanser. Is there a better way?"

Quick and easy ways of banishing smudges on walls is discussed here by Clara and Mary Casey.

Yes, we think so! Cleansing powders and strong cleaners are hard on paint, anyway. They wear off the surface, are usually alkaline and cause the paint to crack and dry out.

What we use are mild liquid paint cleaners that do an efficient once-over job (and that's better than a twice-over any day). We find the results clean and streak-free, especially if you use an upward stroke. The liquids we use are clear ones that smell mild and fresh. Total tools for the job: one bottle, one clean cloth or sponge.

"I don't care for the color of my couch and chair and they spot easily. We'd buy something else if we could. Do people ever dye furniture?"

Not ordinarily. We thought the natural answer here was slip covers. Clara will then have the color she likes, will protect the quite adequate new couch and chair she has and can save all worry about spot-cleaning of her upholstery. And when the slip cover needs it, it can be taken off for cleaning or washing. "For the first time in my life," she mused, "I'm getting an interest in decorating." As a child she had played house, "but I never learned to housekeep before—just worked with what I had." We share Clara's feeling that it is one of the world's great joys to create a colorfully comfortable home. She especially likes the idea of slip covers' offering a change of scene, winter and summer. We liked her summary: "My family and house are my whole life—that's where I'd like to be a success."

deadly nausea arose at the thought of touching her, as if she had had a snake in front of her, and the latter feeling was the stronger.

"You come to me, my lovely lady," said the gypsy, "all the long way, in the midday heat! Please God you will not regret it. Come in, come in now." She held open the door, and as Childerique was about to walk in, she kissed the palm of her hand and deftly placed it for a moment upon the threshold.

Within the room it was hotter and closer than outside. A stripe of golden dust of light lay across it from the small window. The miller's wife had been taking her new bread from the oven; it was arranged upon shelves along the wall. She lifted a three-legged chair into the middle of the floor for her guest. Childerique sat down because a tiredness and giddiness had come upon her. She thought, I would as well sit down in a viper's nest.

"I am informed," she said slowly, "that your dogs are again, in your old manner, running mad down here." The gypsy stared at her, clear-eyed, patient as a child. "That is your affair," said Childerique, "but you may not snap at anyone outside your own pack. You, you have bewitched the young lord of Haut-Mesnil. Get you gone." As she pronounced her brother's name she held on with both hands to the seat of the chair. "Get you gone," she repeated. She remembered having been told how the pious old miller had used to birch his young wife. This creature, she thought, is used to more brutality than I can even think of. She tried to remember the old modes of punishment of which she had, as a child, been shown the instruments.

The gypsy sighed, and shifted on to a position customary to her, standing upon one little foot, with her other naked ankle in her hand. "Ah, ah," she said, "how hard they speak, how hard! Ah, stop it, you cut the heart of the poor girl, you fine lady."

Childerique looked hard at her; she felt her own face under her wide summer bonnet burning. The air of the room, filled with the fragrance of flour and new bread, was heavy to her to breathe. She was at this moment held by a queer fancy. She remembered how she had been taken, as a child, to see the queen as she had been passing through Pirigueux, and how at the sight of the ceremonial she had thought, Whatever happens, happens because it pleases the queen. Even when it had begun to rain the little girl had felt that it did so because the rain pleased the queen. Now, in the presence of the young gypsy the fancy, long forgotten, was recalled. This woman, she thought, is pleased with whatever happens, and this seemed to her to be a strange treachery at the hands of fate. But, she thought, what is the matter with this Simkie? Why on earth is she like a queen, this slut on her bare feet? Is it really the queens and the gypsies who have all that they want, and only we, the women of the great houses and the estates, who have to work to hold up the world? The words of the Scripture came back to her: "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love." Her thoughts shied at the name called forth to her. Could it be the same with the devil as with God? Would he have the equal reward to give for being loved? Yes, she thought, yes, it is so. It is all because Simkie is really a witch, this extraordinary content in her, like that of a child. It is the witch's happiness, this is what she sells herself for to the devil. And somewhere at the bottom of it, as at the bottom of the millpond, she saw the doom of the witch, the sadness and dreadfulness of her fate.

"Are you God, beautiful lady?" asked the gypsy, watching her face. "Are you to manage all the world?"

"Yes," said Childerique with all the strength of her heart. "I am to manage the world here, Champmeslé. God Himself has placed me here to do so. You know that, too, all of you. Beware of me."

"But how can it be, my mistress?" said the young woman. "How can it be? If I have indeed bewitched the lord of Haut-Mesnil, how can I undo it now? You, you know yourself that young men are after women with long hair, who speak sweetly to them, who sport with them. If it be only that, say so, my sweet lady, for you know that a young woman can again make a young man leave her, whom she has made to come to her. But if there have been spells and magic there, and the devil has helped me—why, the devil is on to the work even now, and you and I cannot stop him, indeed, we cannot, my dear, dear mistress."

She was out of breath with speaking so insinuatingly, and stood as if she waited for a decision, very still.

"Yes," said Childerique hoarsely, "you have bewitched him. You brought him to you by spells, you know it well." The gypsy woman began to sway her body as in pain; all her movements were graceful and fascinating.

It occurred to Childerique that her brother had held the girl in his arms. A strong pain and alarm ran through her; she looked away and down. At the same time, as if even the idea of a gentler and sweeter human relation, brought into this place of harsh judgment, was softening the air of it, the terrible hardness which had been like a pain in her entrails seemed to loosen. As often, when she was suddenly and strongly moved, her thoughts ran to her mother; she remembered her good will to the foreigners within her land.

"Simkie," she said, looking again at the gypsy, and for the first time calling her by her name, "release my brother of this magic, and I will forgive you and do you no harm."

Simkie wrung her hands. "Oh, madame," she said, "the devil is not to be jested with. We shall have to make a stronger magic, you and I now, to break the power of the one which has been made."

"Yes, yes," said Childerique. "If you have made one charm, you must be able to make another." At the very moment she thought, What is this that I am saying? How do I get this into my head? I have got fever, surely.

"And what shall I do it for, my lady?" asked Simkie. "If my lord marries me I shall sleep in a silken bed. Why shall I undo my work? What are you going to give me for it?"

Childerique could not answer; she sat dumb. For honor's sake, for the honor of Haut-Mesnil—these words had been strong in her heart all day. But she was ashamed to speak them to the gypsy. She could not tell her that she was really here on her mother's errand, for the sake of that young heir of Haut-Mesnil whom she had failed to bear, and that the strength and courage of the dead woman were bearing up her own, in the service of their house. She looked round in her mind for something to promise the sorceress.

"Let it be for nothing, then," said Simkie, and sighed. "Who knows, who knows, I may get my reward for serving you still, in some way. Only repeat this, that you will not harm me afterward nor will any of your people."

"No, that we will never do."

"But what shall the words of the witchcraft be now, my lady? What am I to demand of the devil of the water, if he will come to us? For what shall he have come?"

Childerique felt again the blood in her face. "For this," she said, "that the lord of Haut-Mesnil turn entirely ——"

"No, no." The gypsy quickly interrupted her, placing a finger on her lips. "Names must never be spoken, that is against the rules of witchcraft. No, wait, I shall speak for you and you will tell me if I am right in what I say, if it be to your good pleasure. This," she went on after a moment, speaking very slowly, and looking down, "shall be a charm to turn the heart of your brother, your father's son, entirely away from the woman whom he now loves, and thinks of as his wife. This shall be a charm to separate the two forever with the help of our guest, whom we have called for."

"Yes," said Childerique, staring into the gypsy's face.

Simkie stood again for a while in deep thought. "It can be done," she said at last, "but not now. Come this time tomorrow, and it will be for you to speak the words, for if I have once spoken a charm I cannot myself speak against it. And you must bring with you ——" She stopped herself. She seemed to change and grow heavier. All lightness of limb and movement had gone from her; she looked worn like a woman with child. "Madame," she said after a long time, "you must bring your little son to help us make the spell. A male child, who has in him blood common to you, who will speak the charm, and of him about whom we speak it. Blood, madame, such noble blood is precious in magic."

Childerique thought, My little son? How am I to bring him here if nobody may know? I shall have to carry him all the way through the forest except where he can run a little. The idea itself was charming to her; it was rare that she had the child to herself without the nurses. But what am I to tell them, she thought, to get away without anybody knowing?

Simkie saw that she hesitated. "Come, come then," she said, speaking in the same heavy and strained way, as if a great weight had been laid on her. "You do not quite have faith in Simkie? Come, I will show you a little magic to make you believe, a little only today."

Childerique looked round her bewildered. "Come this way," said the gypsy, and opened the door to the millroom. Childerique stopped on the threshold for a moment. She had need of her courage now. It was not that she was afraid of what might befall her in there, but she felt the fatality of this one step which took her from the daylight of her life into the play with unknown powers. What made her walk on was not her strength, but her love of danger. The unknown called to her. And she would now know more of witchcraft.

Everything within the large old building was wry and crooked, and from this room to the other three high steps led down. The huge room of the water wheel was much older than the rest of the mill, and built all in timber, now black with age. The room was dim; the panes of the windows were green and covered with cobwebs. It was suddenly quite cold. The room had an atmosphere of its own, made by the presence of the water; its breath met you on the threshold. The river ran below the heavy floor boards. Childerique felt all at once cool and fresh, her face and hands all bedewed like a silver cup quickly filled with ice-cold water. She followed the miller's widow across the floor. This was the room in which the gypsies were said to have their dancing and singing at night. The floor was smoothed and polished with the dragging about of heavy sacks, the sweeping away of grain, and the steps of two hundred years.

This, Childerique thought, was the only room which, within the dreams of her young brother, she had not entered. Well, she was here now. If within his dreams of the future she should still not be there, his dreams would not be true, not in accordance with reality.

In the middle of the room rose the wooden walls of the water wheel's house. "We shall call the magic of the wheel," said the gypsy, "which is the most honest of all magics. Come, my little wheel, my full moon, I let you loose; you shall have all the river to turn you, and no grain to grind."

Her bare feet made no noise as she went to loose the wheel. With an effort she heaved up the ponderous bolt which connected the wheel with the water. At once the room became alive. Above and below a hundred little voices whispered and groaned, the timber creaked and moaned, heavy iron sang and snarled, beyond all the voices rose the roar of the wheel and the splashing of water.

The sweat had sprung out all over the gypsy's face, and Childerique was again struck by her sudden disfigurement. She dragged herself along laboriously, and she had the stiff and empty face of a woman near her confinement. Childerique felt quiet and strong now, her own body light as when she was a child. She was victorious, her adversary prostrate before her; she was even being taken into the heart of the fortifications of the enemy. In her triumph her heart was ready for forgiveness, and beating highly.

The gypsy let up the door to the wheel's shed. "Look down," said she.

Childerique walked out on a little gangway near the wheel, holding on to the rail. She was at once splashed all over by a delicate sprinkle of fresh drops—this was a joke on the part of the water. She thought, for the last time, How can I be so foolish? There will be nothing there but just water.

She had indeed to wait long, before anything else showed itself to her. Then it was as if by a sudden jerk her own position was changed; she was no longer gazing down, or there was no longer any up and down in the world. At this, and all at once, the noise round her changed; it had sense; it spoke.

Before her a great pattern of glowing red sparks was forming itself. First it was like a wheel, then settled into a sort of fixity, but what it was she could not tell. From time to time it was blurred, some of the lights were put out. A strange smell, alarming to her, and a new noise, a grunting or rummaging, spun round her head.

Now again she saw clearly. The sparks were not a pattern on a dark ground, they were themselves the background, that of a flaming evening sky. The black lines, and stripes upon it, were the lower branches of a fir thicket; these branches were dead and bare because the growth was so dense that no light reached down here.

The large moving forms among the trees were a troop of huge black boars. They were all busy grunting and rooting up the earth, buffeting one another and rubbing their backs upon the mighty fir trunks. A sow with her young passed her; a terrible old boar with terrible tusks turned and fixed his little red eyes on her, and afraid that he would come for her, she flinched back. It was all gone. She was in the mill again, giddy and out of breath.

She found herself staring, with a queer delight, into the face of the gypsy. "What is that? What was all that?" she asked.

"That was the old forest of Haut-Mesnil," answered the miller's widow. "That was just the place where the great house stands now."

Enraptured and transported, Childerique turned again to the water wheel. She no longer asked herself what it all meant, or why the gypsy was showing it to her. She felt only a deep ecstasy about this new world opened to her. Had anybody tried to draw her away from the wheel, her mind would have been deranged by grief. The water was now foaming under the buckets of the wheel. "Look again," said the witch.

Again the noise changed; this time it grew fainter, as if melodious A great and sweet, fresh calm came over Childerique.

Before the landscape had shown itself, she knew that it was lovely. It was again the wood, and the place was dark; she could distinguish the depth, and the stems of the trees by the lighter green of the grass and the undergrowth only. It was either the sunset or very early morning, before sunrise. Just in front of her lay a wide space of water, and upon it hung a thin milky mist. She heard wild ducks a little way off, between the rushes. It was all dim around her, like a big bouquet of foliage, reflected within a thick silver mirror. But she herself—to get this view of it all, she must be in the water, the clear surface up to her chin, and she remembered for a moment the dragonfly on a broad green leaf which she had watched from the mill bridge. What a delicious pleasure it was to sit upon the water like this!

In the dusk on the shore she saw a form moving, curious to her at first. It was a woman in white, but a shawl was swathed in a dark shawl. The upper part of her body became merged with her surroundings, the white skirt swept on as on its own. This amazed Childerique; she clapped her hands. But as the lady passed out into the glade, she distinguished clearly the little dark head, the curls arranged à la coup de vent, and a great wave of tenderness and pride exalted the whole being. She knew this lady. Who was she? Immediately after she recognized the spot; it was the outskirts of the park of Haut-Mesnil, and she knew also, at that same moment, the reflection of a star, the first or the last of the summer night, shiver in the lacteal surface of the water. There was a seat in the wood; the young girl sat down on it, and leaned her head upon her folded hands at the back of the seat.

Suddenly Childerique noticed a change in the mirror of the pond. It was broken into an outstretched pattern of little chopped, luminous ripples. And what was this? She saw the next moment: the ducks had been disturbed by something, and came rushing across the water toward her; in the dusk she could not see their tawny bodies, but only the long lines made upon the surface by their hurried retreat. She thought, It is early summer here; the young wild ducks are not fledged yet. But what had disturbed them? A young man came along the forest path, from the opposite side to the woman, hastened up to her and took her in his arms; she sank into his embrace.

At the moment when the lady gave herself up to her lover's adoration Childerique knew her. It was her mother, the fair and cherished Sophie, younger than herself and bright with beauty and happiness. Oh, dear mother, she thought, apple of my eye, I see you at last. The young man must then be her father, so much younger than she remembered him, really just like Philippe when he had first come to France. Her mother had come out to meet her father in the park. Childerique remembered her father as a cold man, coming in silent from the work of the estate, or from hunting. How much she had wronged him if he had come back, in the old days, this. She saw that the two wanted nothing in the world but each other; they clung together, pressed their faces together, and sought and held each other's hands; the woman took the man's face between her hands and lost herself in contemplation of it. Again they sank into each other and made one figure only in the half-light. The gestures were all so familiar; it was indeed as if she had seen herself and Philippe in a looking glass, younger and fairer. She had often been told that she was like her mother, and surely her father had had something of the beauty of Philippe; or it was only that all young men were alike, making love. She remembered an evening, a month perhaps after their wedding, when she herself had gone to meet her husband in the forest, and he had made love to her there. At times then he had alarmed her by the violence of his love for her, as if there were no moment to lose, as if death were threatening to separate the two. Now she knew that that was just the way of her father and mother.

Had she in real life come upon a pair of lovers like this, she knew that she should have turned her eyes away. Not so here, although she felt the blood in her cheeks; not so with her own mother, in this world of sweet witchcraft. Here everything had a deeper meaning and heart, and the mother and daughter could well do service to the gods hand in hand. Nor was she sorry that her mother did not turn and look at her, or notice her at all, although at the first moment she had felt a burning longing for that. This was a lovelier confidence and intimacy; this was as it should be.

The picture was blurred to her as if her eyes had been filled with tears. She again found herself clinging to the wet rail of the gangway in the mill. The miller's widow was before her, with drops of sweat in her eyebrows. Childerique sighed deeply as she realized that the visions were all gone.

"I have shown you true pictures," said the gypsy laboriously.

"Yes, yes," answered Childerique, wringing her hands as the miller's wife had done before.

"I shall show you more tomorrow."

"Yes, tomorrow, tomorrow," said Childerique, feeling how long it was till tomorrow, and how the time would be filled with longing.

Now she herself walked slowly, and she stopped on the threshold to take one more look at the room, and listen once more to the music of the water wheel.

"The wheel has been turning on your behalf, madame," said the gypsy. "The water that turned it has gone a long way already, and will not come back to turn it the other way."

On the bridge she paused. She thought, How much have I learned since I stood here last! How much wiser I am!

She looked round, and was surprised at the change in the earth and air. That high sky had paled, as if bleached, drained of all its rich blue, so much so that the large clouds, which had appeared light against it, now, without having themselves changed their hue, floated like dark, slate-colored clots on a white metal ground. It was cold. Gusts of wind rushed through the trees which swayed and bent. The dust of the road whirled up in little spires.

As she walked through the forest heavy drops of rain came down through the tops of the trees; they felt lukewarm in the cold air. She heard thunder in the distance, but no heavy shower followed—probably there was a great storm somewhere off. She herself, who had rushed down to the mill, now walked with difficulty, although she meant to hasten, like a honeybee, carrying the collected sweetness of moors and gardens through the rain to her hive, heavy and a little unsteady on the wing. In the darkness of the forest path she seemed to feel the nearness of a young lover, and when the twigs and tendrils caught her dress it was as if she had to stop to give him time for a sweet word or a kiss. She thought of her husband, and for the first time in her life she felt an overwhelming longing for his embrace. She calculated how long it would be until she could be in his arms, and pictures of love-making swarmed at her from all sides, like gadflies on the narrow road, and made her face glow and her knees weaken under her.

Where the forest path joined the drive of Champmeslé there grew, curiously, a very old, crooked wild-mulberry tree. She mused under it, and thought, This terrible, sweet drowsiness which makes my limbs so heavy, which lies like honey on my tongue and runs so soothingly in all my veins—can it be a poison, a drug? Does the poppy juice confuse you like this? She remembered having spoken to her brother of the sweet taste of poisons and was surprised at her own wisdom. She thought, I shall never get home, and was astonished when, immediately after, she saw before her Champmeslé.

Her husband, who had seen her approach from his window, came out to meet her. "Where have you been?" he asked her.

Childerique breathed heavily. "Oh, do not ask me," she exclaimed.

"Why not?" said he, and struck by her looks, he added, "My dear, you are not well." He took her hand. "Have you got fever?" he asked her.

"What an idea," said she. "I walked fast to get home. I am a little chilly."

She was frightened herself because at the sight of her husband she felt disappointment and insecurity. It was as if he, the house and garden of Champmeslé and all the life awaiting her there were pale and cold in comparison with the world of witchcraft, as the landscape was pale and cold now compared with the glowing earth and air of an hour ago. Had the warmth and color gone from her live husband to remain with the vision lovers, even with the vision animals of a burning sky and a forest of a thousand years ago?

"Where do you come from?" he asked her again.

"Oh, why do you go on asking me," she cried, "when I would rather have died than told you? I come from the mill, from the miller's widow. Udday's daughter. But you, you know nothing of all this."

"Yes," he said, "I know of Udday. What had you got to do there?"

"Oh, she knows a thousand times more than we do," said Childerique. She took his hand, eager to prove to herself that he was, after all, the lover of the forest path, but let it go again, staring into his face. His hand seemed to her changed, and hot; it burned her cool fingers. He had asked her if she had got fever, but had he not fever?

"You are quite wet," said he, laying his hand on her shoulders. "Be sensible now for once and take off your clothes. You should go to bed, my dear. You were looking feverish last night already."

From her window Childerique, never thinking of changing her clothes, looked toward the horizon and at the figure of her husband, small in the foreground. He had walked on to the end of the terrace and stood there, his hands in his pockets, quite still. She found time to wonder, in the whirl of all her thoughts, what he would be thinking of. He walks there, she said to herself, like a sentinel. He thinks: "Will the storm come up here? It is well that I have got my wheat garnered. Will the lightning strike in the forest of Champmeslé?"

As she followed him with her eyes her heart softened to him; tears pressed against her eyelids even while she kept moving up and down her room.

letters I get! Every day people writing to say with my brain I ought to be President of the United States, and will I give them four thousand dollars? Old ladies stop me in the street and tell me, 'Teddy, you know what you should do with some of that money? You should send some poor deserving boys through college.' 'Yes, ma'am,' I say, 'I hope to—my own.'"

Teddy's mail is also flooded with requests to appear at movie premières, society benefits, and cocktail parties in St. Louis' exclusive Ladue section. Clara, an avid reader of the society pages, is thrilled, then hurt and disappointed when Teddy curtly refuses to oblige. "None of these people ever paid any attention to me before," he cries. "Why should I bother with them now?"

Teddy was born one of six children of a poor immigrant Romanian cobbler. Most of his male relatives were tailors and he can recall no mental giants among them. However, the Nadler family agrees that Teddy's mother was remarkably bright, teaching herself to read and write in Romanian, Hebrew and English. One of Teddy's first chores was lugging home from the public library every epic novel which had been translated into Hebrew. It was her consuming interest in reading, he says, which first led him to the drama-packed tales of Tolstoi and Victor Hugo.

Much of Teddy's mother's time was spent in bed, for she had a heart condition. When Teddy was four, he was sent to the county orphanage, but he soon ran away, finding his way home by trudging along the trolley tracks. His parents returned him the next day, and then when Mrs. Nadler became permanently bedfast following the terrible flu epidemic of 1918, the Nadler children were placed in a different orphanage, this time a Jewish home in St. Louis.

"We left a Jewish section of St. Louis, where we lived, for the Gentile south end," explains Harry, Ted's younger brother, a bright and pleasant-mannered cloth salesman. "We felt freakish and out of place. People didn't show much tolerance in those days and the Gentile kids who dropped in to play called us names, 'Jew-boys' and things like that. Teddy was very undersized then—he looked about five years old instead of eight—and he suffered from a bad speech impediment that kept him back in school. It all added up to the start of a terrific inferiority complex."

Teddy's stay at the orphanage, which lasted for seven years, sounds like something out of Dickens. There was, at the start, a cruel matron who hit the children with rulers, tied them up all day in a basement coalbin, and when they showed too much energy and spirit, lined up the thirty-seven inmates, both boys and girls, and gave them enemas. "She gave us nose irrigations, too," recalls Teddy. "Oh, how that water hurt when it rushed into our heads!"

Fortunately, the matron was soon replaced by a kinder woman and the Nadler children settled down into the drab, monotonous routine of institutional life, relieved only by the advent of Christmas, when each child was given some toys, apples, nuts and oranges. "We looked forward to that day for months and months," says Teddy. One dull afternoon Teddy discovered in one corner of the big dark recreation room some old walnut bookcases filled with worn copies of the classics. The homely undersized child who couldn't pronounce his s's and th's soon had to be dragged away from his books for meals.

When only in the first grade, he polished off Ivanhoe and then went on to The Young Carthaginian, the story of Hannibal, followed by the novels of Scott and Dumas. His appetite for history whetted, Teddy began reading whole encyclopedias and studying maps and atlases. And everything he read became imprinted in his mind like cuneiform characters in wet clay. Today he remembers effortlessly names and dates he read in Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire thirty-five years ago.

But Teddy's hungry mind soaked up more than mere dates and places. His vivid imagination gave faces to history's heroes and they became personalities far more real to him than the people he saw every day. When he thinks of the epic battles of the world, he actually visualizes the commanders of each in action. "I can see the terrain, whether desert or plains or mountains," says Teddy. "I see the troops . . . the uniforms they're wearing . . . their armor." He hears militant music, "those marvelous horns" of Liszt or Musorgski, and he smells the sweat and blood of battle.

"I never forget an epic," says Teddy, who can recall, scene for scene and line for line, the movie Ben Hur which he last saw in 1927. After reading Shakespeare's Julius Caesar through three times, Teddy recited it to his co-workers at the Army depot without a hitch. "I even got those barbarians interested in Caesar," laughs Teddy.

Asked on the $64,000 Challenge to name five of Alexander the Great's generals, Teddy unfalteringly reeled off such tongue twisters as Antigonos, Lysimachus, Perdiccas, Polyperchon and Seleucus—without having thought of these people in over thirty years! Teddy claims that he did no "boning up" for the quiz program whatsoever, that all the information he was called upon to give rose instantly from his fabulous memory.

"I'm a brain surgeon," a plane passenger once told Teddy after listening to him talk from St. Louis to New York. "And I want you to know that you have the finest and most extraordinary mind I've ever come across."

"He looked curious enough to carve me up to see how I ticked," grins Teddy. He is pleased when compared to the great Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes, whose remarkable memory operated somewhat like his; angry when reporters refer to him as a "nitwit" and a "freak."

While still in his early teens, Teddy became fascinated with lonely, primitive islands, who discovered them, what it would be like to run away from civilization, like Gauguin and Robert Louis Stevenson, and live on them. He was annoyed when World War II brought into common usage names of islands he regarded as his own private domain. It was no trick for him to name on the Challenge the countries and islands larger than 5000 square miles which lie on the Equator. Even before the question was completely out of the announcer's mouth, Teddy was mentally in the jungles of Brazil, listening to the chatter of birds and monkeys, as he saw his way around the rest of the globe.

Hannibal . . . Caesar . . . Napoleon . . . "I've lived every day of their lives," Teddy is apt to say. "I can see each one of them. I know what they thought about, how they fought their battles, the women they loved, everything."

Remarks one of Teddy's brothers, "Sometimes when Teddy's talking, I half believe in reincarnation. Sometimes I think Teddy is these dead heroes, come back to tell us that what they did was important."

"Sometimes on quiz programs, contestants miss a date by a thousand years," says Teddy disgustedly. "Why, take the year one thousand A.D. and you're at the time of William the Conqueror. Another thousand years and you're in the twentieth century. Just think what happened in those one thousand years. And people don't know, they don't know! And they don't care!"

Teddy has no great urge actually to see the places he imagines so vividly. "If I saw the ruins of Pompeii, it would depress me," he says, shaking his head.

There is no telling what brilliant academic career might have been Teddy's, for his formal education ended in the eighth grade and he left the orphanage to become a delivery boy at $8 a week.

"Everyone took Teddy for a big laugh," explains his brother Harry. "Even in our own family, we called him crazy. If a talent couldn't be used to bring in money, it was considered useless by the Nadlers. So although we all recognized Teddy's amazing abilities, we couldn't evaluate them. For a few more years Teddy went on cramming his head with history, biography and music, but then one day he said to himself, 'What's the use? What good is it doing me to know all this stuff?' On that day he quit reading everything, including the daily newspaper."

Before that day came, Teddy says, he worked hard and conscientiously to get ahead. After he left the orphanage at sixteen, Teddy moved back with his family and helped support them for the next seventeen years. His mother was a bedfast invalid, his father suffered from an ulcer; it was an atmosphere dominated by fear and sickness and insecurity.

"We were a queer family, queer!" Teddy says of his parents and five brothers and sisters. "All so quiet, so terrified of outsiders! When Harry and I got home from work at night, we took off our shoes so as not to make any noise. We fixed a little toast, a boiled egg. Often we didn't turn on the lights but went to bed in the dark. Nobody ever spoke loud, or slammed a door, ever!"

Most evenings the two brothers retired to their bedroom and behind closed doors listened to classical records or the radio. "Teddy would lie on his back, flipping a coin, and explain the music to me, measure by measure, until I knew it as well as he did," says Harry. (Although Teddy cannot read music, or carry a tune very well, when he talks about a composition he sounds as if he has memorized every program note ever written about it.)

"The first time I heard Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony I was so excited I almost jumped out the window," recalls Teddy. "I ran a mile to tell Harry." In his estimation Mozart's Don Giovanni is so beautiful it is unendurable. "I don't dare buy the records: I'd be up all night; I'd never leave it," he vows. The opera Boris Godunov, by the Russian composer Modest Musorgski, also affects Teddy this way.

Working in a women's clothing store, Teddy rose to be in charge of the delivery department; then he became a clerk in the millinery firm of Ackerman and Rosenthal. But with the depression came a period which Teddy recalls as a "drab, morbid" part of his life. He knew how to pack hats for shipping; sometimes he earned $1 a day, and sometimes he worked for nothing. He spent a lot of time at the Y.M.C.A., where he was a swimming coach. To occupy his mind, he used to stage imaginary relay races between Japanese, Swedish and American swimmers whose styles and speeds he knew. Then he would post the results on the blackboard for the amusement of his friends.

Meanwhile, he learned the hat-blocking trade and took a job in Cincinnati. Co-workers there remember him as the odd fellow who was always begging, "Ask me a question! Any question!" They almost always asked about baseball, and Teddy always had the answer. Although baseball bores him to pieces, and he cannot sit through a single inning, he knows the hits, runs, doubles, triples, homers and batting averages of hundreds of players over fifty-six years of baseball. "And I hate the game," he says.

By 1936, Teddy was shipping hosiery for the Berland Shoe Company in St. Louis for $80 a month. "Bet I can hum excerpts from two hundred operas," he challenged the worker next to him, who refused to put up any money, but who tolerated Teddy's humming for the next four days.

About this time, Teddy developed an ulcer. He also, in 1941, left the clothing business for good and entered Civil Service. He was put to work as a packer at an Army medical depot in St. Louis. Teddy's photographic mind allowed him to glance at a requisition sheet of perhaps twenty-five different medical items and then go from floor to floor and section to section of a multistoried warehouse collecting them without once again referring to the list. And he was invariably right. Frequently he corrected other workers' mistakes and was hurt to discover that they seldom appreciated his help.

Teddy's record shows that he was capable, hardworking and superconscientious (he had accumulated 125 days of sick leave when he quit), yet, after the war, he says he was the first of the depot clerks to be thrown back into the laboring pool. When Teddy left Civil Service after fifteen years, he was the only white member of a crew loading steel office files and desks into Army trucks.

"I never knew how to play politics," says Teddy bitterly. . . . "Teddy doesn't know how to make the right kind of noises to the right people. He's a lone wolf," say his brothers.

In 1942, Teddy was thirty-three years old, weighed a skinny 125 pounds, and had by some miracle accumulated $1100. He had never been seriously involved with a girl ("I thought a lot more about symphonies than pretty girls," he says) until he met Clara Cohen, a dark-haired girl, ten years younger than himself, with warm blue eyes and a ready smile. Clara was the daughter of a Russian immigrant junk dealer and the Cohens' big house was alive with the comings and goings of seven happily extroverted children. (Clara's brother Ben, who changed his name to Elkins, had one of the best-known dance bands in St. Louis.) The first time Teddy visited Clara's home he stroked the heavy draperies and

In this quiz program, a "challenger" like Teddy Nadler first pits his knowledge of a particular field or fields against another expert—a "champion" who has acquired the title by winning either on the $64,000 Challenge itself, or on a sister CBS-TV quiz show. If he wins, as Teddy did, then he becomes a champion, and may be brought back on the show when a suitable newcomer challenges him. The two contestants start competing by trying to answer questions with a prize value of $1000, then $2000. These are relatively easy. Then, each week, they are each asked an increasingly difficult question valued at $4,000, $8,000, $16,000, $32,000 and, finally, $64,000—concluding whenever one contestant gives a correct answer, and the other fails.

patted the soft furniture in disbelief. "My dinner plate had so much food on it I thought I was supposed to pass it around the table," he says.

Clara was attracted by Ted's honesty and by his pathetic desire for a home and family of his own. "He didn't say, 'Let's get married.' He said, 'We'll put up some shelves and buy some groceries,'" Clara recalls.

But for the first three years of their marriage, housing was scarce and they lived with her family. "Ted was so shy in those days he refused to speak on the telephone and he jumped if anybody spoke to him," one of Clara's brothers recalls. "But if we had a discussion about anything, he'd always butt in with a lot of information nobody wanted to hear. He made us feel, 'What are we, stupid or something?'"

As soon as they could, the young couple moved into the three-room railroad flat in a Jewish and Negro neighborhood which was to be their home for the next twelve years. To get the apartment, Teddy had to pay $800 for the furniture in it, all of which eventually fell apart. When the babies came, three boys, he proved himself a devoted parent. Although the oldest son is now twelve, Clara and Ted have never had a baby sitter. "I wouldn't trust anybody," explains Ted. During their infancies, he checked on them almost every fifteen minutes in their cribs and made formula. "If one of them cried at night, I got right up," relates Ted. "How can anybody lie in bed while a baby's crying? It's cruel, cruel!"

Before her parents died last year, Clara used to spend every Saturday, Sunday and holiday with them. She has always been deeply attached to her family, perhaps because she was sickly as a child. When only five, she was run over by a cement mixer; and surviving this extraordinary mishap, she later had blood poisoning and frequent mastoid infections. A loyal and uncomplaining person, she lives for her home and her loved ones. "I'm the type to suffer to the end. Don't want to spend money on myself," she smiles, telling about the time last year she went around for three days with a gefüllte-fish bone caught in her throat before seeking medical aid.

On the days Clara was at her parents', Ted took the boys to the park and wrestled with them, played ball, and told them stories by the hour. "How they love their dad!" says Clara. "He makes them laugh. They have good times."

Ted's stories are of two kinds: as he puts it, "fantastic, improbable tales in which the hero—that's me—is sent to some remote part of the world on an adventurous mission; and funny stories, like hiding all the food in the house when the relatives come to call."

According to their parents, the Nadler boys have never broken a toy, a window or lamp, or struck another child in anger. Michael, the oldest, is twelve, a strapping black-haired boy who gets excellent marks at school. "Michael is all the time for peace," says his mother. "He wants everything quiet, no arguments. And he worries, all the time worrying. When I give him money to go to the ball game, he says, 'Can you spare it, ma? Can you spare it?' Never has he left the house without first kissing his mother. And for Ted he feels sorry, so sorry."

Bruce, aged nine, of the roguish smile and rosy cheeks, is the most sensitive of the three. "For Bruce I like always to be home," explains Clara. A sweet, appealing, conscientious child, he tries constantly to please, and a harsh word will literally make him sick, says his mother. Because of his tender feelings, he gets special consideration from the whole family; if there is one cupcake left, for instance, his brothers will invariably save it for Bruce.

Joel, the baby, is five and already a whiz at memorizing his baseball "flip" cards. A husky, blond-headed child, he idolizes his father. "Daddy will answer it all right," he told his mother serenely each time Ted appeared on TV. His father's $152,000 winnings have meant a tricycle for Joel, two-wheelers for his brothers; they have demanded nothing more. Even at his age, Joel seems to sense the insecurity which hangs over Ted. "Hurry up, hurry up," he shrieks as the family climbs into its secondhand Plymouth. He points to the open door and adds, "You're wasting the car light bulb!"

When Michael was paralyzed by polio at the age of five, neither parent could bear sending him to the hospital. Instead, Clara kept him by her side on a cot in the kitchen, and for ten weeks she and Ted massaged him as the nurse instructed. "I nearly went crazy with worry," Ted recalls. This was also the lowest point of his Civil Service career—the garbage detail. Fortunately, Michael made a complete recovery.

Why didn't Ted quit? Because, he explains, he was earning between $1.70 and $1.98 an hour, plus annual leave and sick benefits, which was better than he thought he could do elsewhere. Medical bills were piling up: a mastoid operation for Clara coincided with a serious strep-throat infection for Michael; when Clara's mother died, Teddy suffered an ulcer attack which sent him to the hospital. For the past two years, medical bills for the Nadlers totaled $2000.

When the present crop of big quiz shows appeared, Teddy Nadler had not opened a book or read a newspaper in fifteen years. To his surprise, he found he could answer most questions before the TV contestants, particularly if they pertained to history, mythology, geography, music or baseball. Encouraged by Clara, he began to write letters to The $64,000 Challenge.

"Sometimes I wrote arrogant letters and told them my knowledge was fantastic—out of this world—that I was a walking encyclopedia of information," says Teddy. "I said I know every headline event from 4004 B.C. until 1940—that's when I quit reading. When they didn't answer my letters, I wrote humble ones and then I told them I was sitting and defrosting the refrigerator."

At last came the long-awaited phone call from New York asking Teddy to come East for interviews. As it happened, they called on payday, so Teddy blew his entire week's take-home pay of $70 on a round-trip coach ticket. ("Nobody said anything about going Pullman") and sat up all night in his one suit of clothes. "I had a toothache and my ulcer hurt something awful and I worried how I'd look before the cameras with no front teeth. Of course once I got to know the people on the program, and how nice they are, I knew they wouldn't care if you looked like an orangutan."

An hour after arriving sleepless in New York, Teddy was seated in a penthouse office on Madison Avenue, faced by a female in horn-rimmed glasses behind a pile of books. Groggy and confused, and fighting the speech impediment which worsens with strain, Teddy felt at first he was doing poorly. But to his surprise the woman became increasingly excited. "I think we've got something here," she said, pressing the buzzer and summoning more experts. Finally a dozen or more brains lounged about listening with respectful attention, an experience unique in Teddy's forty-six years.

"Teddy was like a kettle that's been at full boil with the lid on for years," explains one of

"I dreamt of having a great, noisy Irish family, with lots of holidays to celebrate, in an enormous old house with four fireplaces. It turned out that our friends were right about the pitfalls of buying a big old house. And we weren't cut out to be parents of seven. But do we regret it? Heavens, no!"

the listeners. "And then suddenly, wham! the lid was off."

The rest is television history. Teddy went on the show that Sunday night, minus his teeth, against two attorneys, William and James Egan, of Hartford, Connecticut, one of whom was a Rhodes scholar. Teddy made his first and only "miss" when he couldn't recall five full Confederate generals. He named three, and James Egan got only one. The match ended in a tie and $16,000 for Teddy. On subsequent appearances he defeated a renowned authority on the Civil War, Dr. Austin Ranney, of the University of Illinois; Mrs. Lowell Thomas, Jr., on geography; an archaeologist, Dr. Thalia Howe; and restaurateur Toots Shor, whom he bested easily in baseball.

He remains undefeated in every category he has tried with the exception of music, where he was ruled wrong on a technicality. Teddy said that Beethoven's Fourth was called the B Minor Symphony; his opponent said B Major; it took a special board of judges including Leonard Bernstein to decide the complicated issue, but finally Teddy was ruled wrong.

Says the master of ceremonies of the show, Ralph Story, about Teddy, "When he first came on the show, he had a terrific inferiority complex, and at the same time great arrogance. Seventy per cent of the people who wrote to me couldn't stand him. Now my mail is just the opposite: seventy per cent are begging to have him back on the show. This makes Teddy Nadler one of the greatest contestants of all time. He not only has impact but he's mercurial—he grows and changes on the program.

"The more chance Teddy gets to ventilate, the more his arrogance and inferiority complex lessen. The last time I saw him, he actually told a little joke at my expense. Teddy is beginning to relate to other people. This would have been inconceivable a year ago."

However, as Teddy's winnings pile up, his underdog appeal lessens and fewer experts are willing to challenge that inexhaustible fount of total recall. Few college professors care to be trounced by an eighth-grader. And although Teddy has been offered jobs in New York, Detroit and Chicago from insurance firms and stock brokerages, in St. Louis his talents have so far been ignored. And Clara refuses to leave her home town, friends and family. There is only one question which consistently stumps Teddy: the future.

It is one of the greatest blessings that so many women are so full of tact.
WILLIAM OSLER

In discussing the twist of fate which brought him fame and fortune beyond his wildest dreams. Teddy remarks:

"Most of the great rulers got to be king just by chance. Look at ugly old me, now—I got three suits of clothes, three sets of teeth." He grins, showing a large expanse of ivory. "And I got my music."

He stretches out on his cellar chaise and puts on the machine Mozart's Cosi Fan Tutti (which he calls fondly "tootsie"). As long as the music plays, a smile of heavenly content banishes from his face the dark worry.

"Who wants to work?" jests this ex-laborer. "Just livin' is work."

WHAT IS INTELLIGENCE?

o bring to mind a memorable phrase of William Faulkner's: "Man will not merely endure: he will prevail." Out of the troubled spirit of man, many triumphs are won, some obvious and fanfared and some known only to the triumpher. In the eyes of the world, Ted, by overcoming his childhood difficulties, was only then on an elementary competing basis with his more fortunate fellow men. His triumph in reaching that point was not obvious. Yet resourcefulness and courage went into the struggle against uneven odds, at a time when Ted received little encouragement from any source, and he went on to become a self-reliant and contributing citizen and a partner in a rewarding marriage. His key area of dissatisfaction, then, has been in his work.

One of Ted's admitted difficulties has been in getting along with other people. One of the criticisms he has met with is that he tends to talk too much, should listen more. Carried by the momentum of his memory, he may tend, conversationally, to lose a sensitivity to others' reactions. A gift, too, is best used when it does not put others on the defensive, another area to which Ted plans to devote more thought. How his memory can be best put to work requires both some self-analysis and some research in the job field. The job he gave up called less for his memory skills than for physical labor to which he was not primarily suited. Much more to his liking, and probably yielding of more recognition and satisfaction, would be work as historical researcher, librarian, proofreader, inventory expert with a big manufacturing firm, work of a computing or accounting or tax nature, or a variety of compatible possibilities. Often professional guidance, psychological or vocational, will help solve this problem, and a good deal of counseling is available today along this line.

As a result of our talk, I have jotted down some of the questions Ted is thinking over at this time. Perhaps you want to take the same kind of personal evaluation test. Any "no" answers you check in the first section are good reason to go on to the second section.

Am I a Successful Human Being?

my way of living a true reflection of my intelligence?	☐	☐
Am I reasonably happy in most areas of life?	☐	☐
Have I set myself a realistic goal?	☐	☐
Am I willing to struggle or sacrifice to reach my goal?	☐	☐
Am I doing today what will bring me closer to achievement tomorrow, a year from now, five years from now?	☐	☐
Have I overcome recognized faults that might sidetrack me?	☐	☐
Am I capable of putting to the proof the talents I claim?	☐	☐
Do I consider myself, rather than others, to blame for past failures?	☐	☐
Am I able to accept criticism and use it constructively?	☐	☐
Do I recognize the value of the present over the irretrievable past and the unforeseeable future?	☐	☐

One to three "No" answers show minor areas that need thought and improvement. Five "No" answers are a danger signal—time to look for crossroads rather than plunge ahead in the same pattern as in the past. Ten "No" answers call for a complete re-evaluation of life and some constructive action.

How Can I be More Successful?

What is my strongest talent?
How and where can I put it to use?
If for others, have I made it known to the persons or firms most likely to be interested?
Have I overlooked, or failed to seek, counsel from those who are qualified to direct me?
Do I recognize my liabilities and make a serious effort to overcome them?
Am I willing to learn from others?
What practical step can I take today toward reaching my goal?
Do I want it enough to take that step?
Is there anything to stop me, except myself?

for women only!

Sure, gentle, more normal relief... even after childbirth and during menstrual periods

Constipation presents special problems to a woman.

A woman's system is complex and sensitive. It undergoes cycles of change during which constipation may make discomfort even more severe. So it's almost unbelievable that science never until now has developed a special laxative for woman's special needs!

Correctol is a new kind of laxative... made possible only by a recent major medical discovery.

This medical miracle is a new non-laxative regulator which simply softens waste. Along with this, you get just enough mild laxative to start you toward normal regularity.

So Correctol acts promptly but unhurriedly. It gives the relief a woman wants and needs... but it's gentle, more normal relief. What's more, Correctol gives these results with far less laxative medicine than other preparations using the same ingredient for their effect!

Try new Correctol. See how much more naturally it brings relief. 30 tablets, only $1.00—any drugstore.

Your Special Holiday Greetings

By JEANNE BAKER WALWORTH

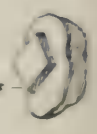
Originality is the subtle difference that you'll notice in all good Christmas-card collections. So why not get the family together and make your own? Nothing is more rewarding than having your friends comment, "We always look forward to your special holiday greeting."

Here are a few simple suggestions which can be varied in many different ways.

Ice-cream-cup lids obtained from dairy stands can be gaily decorated with colored sticky tape and gold edging to reproduce the elegance of a Christmas-tree ball. Ribbon threaded through the top adds dimension. Message is written on the opposite side.

Colorful foreign stamps can be glued to lightweight cards to make a greeting. Up to a thousand foreign stamps can be purchased at most department stores for around a dollar. An inexpensive rubber printing set can be used to postmark Christmas tidings in many languages. Print in gold simply by pouring metallic gold paint over a folded blank instead of using a black ink pad.

Although it's fun to take a special Christmas photo, you can often use existing family-album snapshots. Quantities of prints made from a negative are moderately priced and take about a week to get. Holes are punched in this card and a tiny sandwich board is tied on with red ribbon. Your message can be printed or hand-lettered in red or green ink.



During the months before Christmas, most department stores sell bolts of ribbon with your personalized Christmas greeting printed on them. You can cut your photographs in various shapes and hang them on the tree with this ribbon. Be sure to plan all your cards to fit standard envelopes and try to have them all completed before cooky making, tree trimming and parties start.

You don't have to be a wood carver to make different and beautiful cards. Using an ordinary potato with a design cut in about ¼" relief makes you an expert in minutes. Also try different-color papers. Gluing on little flat sequins also adds a nice sparkle to your card.

Rumer Godden

Dolls in toyshops talk. RUMER GODDEN has convinced us. She'll convince you, too, in The Story of Holly and Ivy on page 42. It's a little girl's dream of Christmas come true, she says. If books are the dreams of authors, Rumer Godden has seen more than a dozen of hers come true, besides many short stories. She lives in a cottage in Buckinghamshire, in Southeast England, which is cherry-orchard country. "I grow roses," she reports, "and listen to village gossip as heard over the hedge; the house is shut in by thick, high, green hedges. I have a husband and two daughters who share my interest in Pekingese dogs and their ancient history, in ballet, herbs, Hindu philosophy and Victorian dollhouses. To write, I need, as Stephen Spender says, 'avenues of time, pools of quiet'—but I almost never have them."

Elizabeth Cadell

The Sugar House, page 44, is the creation of another British friend, ELIZABETH CADELL. Born in India, she was educated in Calcutta, London and Darjeeling (in that order). Now she has a home on the isle of Jersey overlooking the English Channel. She has made fourteen trips to India ("I long ago resolved not to let the possession of a house keep me from leaving it") and one to the United States. "I learned at least one important fact about your country," she recalls. "It isn't Acheson to Pekoe, as I've sung so often— it's Atchison-Topeka!"

Appleyard Center, the setting of the food feature on page 62, is an imaginary village with real people in it, and what they do there mainly is eat. Mrs. Appleyard and her recipes are the creation of LOUISE ANDREWS KENT and her daughter, ELIZABETH KENT GAY, of Calais, Vermont. "The things that happen in Appleyard Center may not always be true in fact," the daughter says, "but they are true in character—and the food is especially real." This we believe. It's going to be a full, rich Christmas Day.

Are People Helpless?

Somewhere in Illinois

Gentlemen: When I was a small girl in the 1890's, I earned many a premium getting JOURNAL subscribers. Now I'm an old farmer's widow still reading it, but somehow not as fond of it as I used to be.

Why must everyone's innermost thoughts and feelings be dragged out and displayed? Are people so helpless these days that they cannot figure out anything for themselves, nor endure a bit of hardship in the way of work or worry? I went through a bad time learning to keep house on a farm fifty-six years ago, but it never occurred to me to rush into print with a "poor me" attitude.

Name Withheld

Part of Their Christmas

Harvard, Illinois

Dear Editors: This "thank you" note should have been written long ago, but it is no less sincere by its tardiness. I want to thank you for your 1954 Christmas editorial. It was called "God Rest You Merry."

We have tried to establish some family traditions that our three children and their nine cousins will remember as a part of their childhood. We had long searched for something to read before our gift exchange; and when I read your editorial I was sure I had found it. My husband read it to us, and everyone agreed it should become a part of our Christmas!

The last weeks of preparing for the holidays are always hectic, leaving too little time for remembering that Christmas must be a time for giving love to my family. I find that if I take time to read "God Rest You Merry" I am a more loving parent.

Sincerely,
MRS. ROBERT HERRICK

Thoughts on Motherhood

Norfolk, Virginia

Dear Editors: A mother is a maker, mender, a moderator.

She makes boxer pants and chocolate pudding, law and sometimes order, castles threats, promises and lion suits. She makes horses' heads from paper bags, little suits from big ones, new skirts from old ones, sun suits from kitchen curtains, small balloons from popped ones, stew from nothing whatever. She makes Mercurochrome faces, peanut-butter-and-jelly sandwiches, and peace when possible.

A mother mends broken saucers and broken hearts, trouser knees, hurt noses and hurt feelings, trouser knees, overalls and trouser knees. She mends old sheets, old rosebushes, old baby dolls and brand new trouser knees.

She is a moderator in times of war, civil war, verbal war, insurrection, minor skirmishes, attacks from the enemy; in times of strife, in times of injustice, in times of temper, in times of hair pulling.

A mother counts calories and blessings and children's heads in the car. Never sheep!

She stoops and crawls and bends and stretches. She folds over and under and backward—and retrieves the baby from under the bed.

Reasons for thanks.

She is immune to surprise: the glass of water in the desk drawer, the cat in the bookcase drawer, the lizard in the electric train, the split foreheads, chins, infinitives.

A mother leads nine lives, each teeming so with life that she has no time to read the article "Make Yourself Feel Needed."

There are times when she reaches the despair. The plumbing stops up and torrents pour through the dining-room ceiling again. Two-year-old bites the cat's tail and breaks it. The toddler drinks fountain pen ink and eats the last of the label, which as the doctor says, "Read me the contents!" The current infant screams with colic—soothing medications must be halted while mother sprints to a relentless doorbell. There stand two neighborhood children to report, "Your baby is crying." Seven-year-old, after forty-five minutes, cannot spell "what." Fingerprints all over the house loom suddenly vivid. The ragged edge of the rug seems suddenly dreadful. The dog won't go out. The toast won't come in. The gelatin won't jell. The sun won't shine. The diapers won't dry. The stew sticks and cocoa boils over.

Mother leans chin on mop handle and mutters, "Next time I'll raise chickens, Lord. Children are too much."

Then ten-year-old slips in—rough and ready, all boy, fifth-grade football player—to confide, "At the Cub Scout meeting we had to list the five things most precious to us, and I did: One—God; two—love; three—peace; four—America; five—Strauss waltzes."

Old Oriental Custom

Honolulu, T.H.

Dear Editor: With the "new" Oriental type of furnishings, I have been wondering why, with all the innumerable labor-saving devices, no one has come up with the suggestion of adopting the age-old Oriental custom of leaving shoes at the entry of a house. Why not tubbable slippers to be worn only in the house, to be put on immediately upon coming in the door? This would have particular merit in view of the expense and work of cleaning light-colored rugs and tile—also in keeping hardwood floors glossy and polished.

The Ceremony Known as Afternoon Tea

London, England

Dear Editors: When I was first confronted with a pot of very strong brown tea, a pot of hot water, a pitcher of milk, a bowl of sugar, and an empty cup in which I was eventually supposed to create a delectable brew, I sadly realized that the delights of English teatime were reserved for the initiated.

Now after six months of diligent observing (and innumerable cups of tea), I am prepared to give my compatriots a practical initiation.

First, let's see what English tea isn't. A friend from California wrote to tell me how she had created a proper English atmosphere by preparing clear green China tea (I bet she could even see the bottom of the cup!), toasted English muffins and orange marmalade. I never had the heart to tell her that what she actually had was a curiously international meal representing the Orient, American pseudo-English and the English breakfast. My friend would probably be pacified by being reminded that we won our independence long ago, and she can fix her tea as she pleases. But she mustn't pretend it's English.

If you will be my guest, we shall set the clock at 4 P.M. There will be either a table set or individual space provided around the room; and at each place are a cup and saucer, small plate, knife similar to a bread-and-butter knife, and a tiny spoon. No forks are allowed.

First the pot must be warmed with hot water. Once this water is discarded, the tea leaves are added to the pot and the water is added "hot off the boil." The packets always instruct you in scientific measuring—one teaspoon of tea per cup. Then it proceeds illogically to tell you to fill the pot with boiling water, never seeming to note that different pots hold different amounts. One could measure by cupfuls, but this would take away romance and never allow for the variety of encountering an average cup of tea or one which is "jolly good."

Now fill another pot with boiling water and proceed to the tea table to pour. We then approach a controversial subject: whether milk is to be poured into the cup before or after the tea. (You will have milk.) The milk firsters claim that the liquids mix better if the tea is on top; the milk lasters insist that their system allows more accurate judging in the amount of milk added as the tea turns color. The point is, be certain to ask; everyone always has an opinion. Sugar is optional—guests help themselves. Finally, the extra pot of boiling water is used to refill the pot containing tea leaves when a fresh brew is needed.

The rules for selection of foods to accompany the tea are even more strict and numerous. The basic principle is: proceed in courses from the less sweet to the more sweet. Do not sample cake before bread and butter. We might start with hot buttered toast, scones, or crumpets accompanied by jam or, if lucky, lemon curd. This first course is followed by sweet biscuits—and here a vocabulary lesson is in order. When I want a biscuit, I ask for a scone, and if I want cookies, I ask for sweet biscuits. Once sweet biscuits are consumed, cakes appear, and even the tiniest morsel has a very important name: Jap Fancies, Piped Genoese Slices, Chocolate Boxes, Treacle Tartlets, Ginger Parkins. You recall that forks are forbidden? You must cultivate the art of slicing your sweet into an edible portion and then taking it in hand—rather difficult, but you'll learn. Since by this time it must be at least 5:05, you are free to depart. (You must never leave at 5, since it would appear you had been clock watching.)

I'm certain that my California friend is now dashing to the kitchen to prove she is capable of doing this properly, and to let her know there are no hard feelings, I shall share my recipe, borrowed straight from my English landlady, for Lemon Curd, a delicious jam substitute blessed with an unfortunately ugly name.

LEMON CURD

⅔ cup granulated sugar
¼ cup butter
Strained juice of 2 lemons
Lemon rind (optional)
3 eggs

Place sugar, butter, lemon juice and rind in a saucepan. Beat eggs and add to first mixture. Cook over low heat, stirring constantly. Mixture will become thin and syrupy but will gradually thicken. When it is thick and custardlike (about 20 minutes), remove from heat and pour into a jar.

Sincerely,
BETTY PETERSON

DIARY of DOMESTICITY

By Gladys Taber

This is the season to open the doors of the heart.

Now the soup kettle comes into its own. We use a very old cast-iron one with a cover and a sturdy disposition. It hangs comfortably over the apple-wood fire or works well on the range.

I dare say a thousand years hence if archaeologists should dig up Stillmeadow's kitchen, they would be hard put to it to establish the period. For if they first uncovered the hand-wrought square nails and the ancient H and L hinges and my old iron kettle and the wooden sugar scoop and the mortar and pestle and the wooden bread tray that we use for salads—well, they would be happy. But then they might dig up the pressure cooker, the modern metal pans, the stainless-steel cutlery, not to mention the toaster and coffee maker!

The secret of a good soup is long, slow cooking and plenty of ingredients in it. I can well remember the first time mamma took me to a formal dinner and when the consommé came on I looked up and said in a clear and carrying voice, "But mamma, it hasn't got a thing in it!"

The typical Stillmeadow soup begins with marrowbones, a bouquet garni (which is parsley, celery tops, leek tops or whatever I find around), onions—naturally—6 or 7 cloves, seasoned salt, freshly ground pepper, a pinch of chili, of garlic, and a sprinkle of monosodium glutamate. After a long simmer, I add the vegetables such as firm winter carrots, diced potatoes, celery. Cabbage does no harm. Later I add all the leftover vegetables in the refrigerator, a few frozen peas, Lima beans, mushrooms. I may even add that solitary parsnip—but parsnips are sweet and should be used sparingly. Then I dump in a can of tomatoes. In case the bones are on the scant side, I take out my favorite concentrates and add a teaspoon of beef extract or meat paste. And tomato paste adds that special taste. (I always use a little of this in gravy.)

This is all so easy. Every time I go past the soup kettle on my way to let dogs in, let dogs out, get the mail or hunt for something, I stop long enough to toss something in the soup kettle. A bay leaf is a must.

This soup has infinite variations. Such as noodles or macaroni. Or parsley dumplings.

If the soup bones have meat on them—and our Louis is very good about meat on the bones—we serve horse-radish. The chunks of well-seasoned hearty beef close to the bone take kindly to horse-radish; you eat the soup separately.

When Jill ladles it out, she always serves the cockers and Irish too. They like soup better than anything except the crispy fat from a steak.

Christmas soup is, of course, based on turkey, and I take a dim view of people who strain it. My turkey soup could almost walk alone. The dressing gives it such an added stability, and so does that tiny bit of giblet gravy. I do not use potatoes in this, always noodles or spaghetti, for the dressing is already there. It is a messy job taking the meat from the turkey bones, but well worth it.

Before Christmas, Jill brings home a ham, so we are fortified against extra guests. We love the true rich Virginia ham, but the Northern ham is also de cious. The new boned, cooked ham very good, and so easy.

We no longer cut our own Christm tree, because we have grown so anxio about conservation. All the Christm trees we planted years ago, we find cannot bear to cut. But in our villag the buying of a tree is rather unusual. hundred trees are stacked around in t yard of the Bullet Hill School (the olde school in Connecticut, we are tol Everyone drives into the schoolyard a finds his tree and loads it in the trunk the car and goes home with it. Event ally, by asking around, we find we c leave the money for it at the store, a the American Legion or the Lions whoever will pick it up. This makes n glad to live here, just as I feel glad wh we pass a vegetable stand by the road a can choose whatever we want and p the money in a cigar box.

One Sunday I ran out of gas on t way home from church and I pulled at Arza Bennett's gas station. Althou he is closed on Sunday, some man w there working on his car, so he pump my car full of gas, and said, "You c settle tomorrow." Of course I could ha taken off for Canada with sixteen gallo of gas, but around here this seldo happens.

A few transients do skip with unpa grocery bills, but I have known t grocer to carry people indefinitely, a get paid for his trust in the end.

The snow falls gently the first time, b starry flakes settle silently. The villa children watch anxiously, for they a dreaming of a white Christmas, and th may melt! But at my age, I view the sl wondering whether the roads will slippery when we meet all those trai ten miles away. Or whether the parkw will be hazardous as the traffic skates o of the city. Romantic or not, I prefer d roads.

When the tree is set up, the house b gins to smell of pine. Jill brings down t cartons of ornaments, and we check how many silver balls Holly broke l year as she flew to the door to greet t children. We play Christmas carols we trim the tree, and Jonquil comes in wag at the candy canes. Holly is bu sniffing at the woodshed door, for t turkey is there, wrapped in foil.

DESERT CHRISTMAS

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

"Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judaea in the days of Herod the king, behold, there came wise men from the east . . . saying, Where is he that is born King of the Jews? For we have seen his star in the east, and have come to worship him."

We sat on bleachers—nearly 3000 of us—under the spangled night sky, and a man's voice narrating the immortal lines from Matthew rang out with peculiar clarity in the intense stillness of the desert. As he spoke a large electric star did rise in the east, and we saw the dim silhouettes of head-shawled men on camels.

"And as Luke records," the voice continued, "She brought forth her firstborn son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger; because there was no room for him in the inn."

A light appeared behind a gauzy curtain and a young girl, about fifteen, was seen bending over an infant, her face grave and serene, with a youthful Joseph in the background.

"And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flock by night," the voice related.

"And, lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them; and they were sore afraid. And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy. . . . For unto you is born this day . . . a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. . . .

"And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying,

"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men. . . .

"And the shepherds said one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing which is come to pass. . . ."

Out of the dimness as the voice spoke, the shepherds appeared with their sheep, wearing the dress of the desert shepherds as it has been from time immemorial, their heads, too, shawled to the shoulders, and in their hands the familiar crooks. Throughout the Near East one sees such figures everywhere—very familiar to the Shepherd of men, Who spoke of them in His parables. We saw that these were very young indeed—perhaps ten or twelve years old. The sheep behaved as sheep do, and the young shepherds were put to it to herd them away from the bleachers toward the manger, over which the star had shifted, and we laughed a little.

But angels (with pretty American little-girl faces) now appeared over the Lord's birthplace, opening and closing their wings; the wise men dismounted from their camels, which dropped to their knees; the voice of the invisible reader was silent, but behind another filmy screen a chorus swelled forth:

"Joy to the world, the Lord is come,
Let earth receive her King."

And at that moment a new star appeared above the angels, the great evening star, seeming as do all stars in the desert East much closer to the earth than elsewhere, and glory shone around in a light as soft as that cast by the moon. The voices sang:

"It came upon the midnight clear,
That glorious song of old,
From angels bending near the earth
To touch their harps of gold."

The reverent little figures as still as those in the crèches carved from olive wood today in Bethlehem, the lovely voices singing now the grand Christmas choruses—"O come all ye faithful," and now the gentle ones, "O little town of Bethlehem," and "Silent Night"—cast a spell over all of us, and a three-star American general, sitting beside me, brushed his eyes in a gesture half ashamed.

The presentation of the Nativity continued through narration and song, accompanying nine luminous tableaux. A great deal of talent, dramatic, scenic and musical, had been mobilized among the many youngsters and a few

NEW IDEA! TUNA-BAKE

Suggests Elsie, the Borden Cow

1 (7-oz.) can tuna fish ¼ cup chopped onion ¼ cup chopped celery
2 (8-oz.) cans tomato sauce 1 cup water
¾ teaspoon salt ¼ teaspoon oregano ¼ teaspoon pepper
1 cup (4-oz.) elbow macaroni, cooked
1 (1½ oz.) canister of Borden's Grated Parmesan and Romano Cheese

Drain tuna, reserving 3 tablespoons oil. Cook onions and celery in oil until soft. Add tomato sauce, water and seasoning. Simmer, covered 15 minutes. Arrange layers of macaroni, tuna and sauce in greased 1-quart casserole. Sprinkle each layer of sauce generously with Borden's Grated Parmesan and Romano Cheese. It's the only blend of two great Italian cheeses – dry, sharp Parmesan and rich, full-flavored Romano. Bake in moderate oven (375° F.) 20 minutes or until sauce bubbles. Makes 4 servings.

P.S. Borden's exclusive blend of two popular Italian cheeses perks up every hot bite of many casseroles.

And here's an idea. Keep a big 3-oz. canister handy at all times – so your family can shake new cheese excitement on spaghetti, onion soup, hot vegetables, salads, eggs, etc. It shakes easily because the holes are extra-large. Keeps fresh for days without refrigeration. And only Borden's Grated Parmesan and Romano tastes so great!

For 100 years folks have been saying,
"If it's Borden's, it's got to be good!"

adults. We sat in coats, with blankets over our knees, for when the sun goes down desert nights are cold, with a different coldness from that of snowy lands.

We had been dreaming of a white Christmas, there in Saudi Arabia a year ago. For the Northerner, Christmas is snow and holly, mistletoe and tinseled spruce trees, a log on the hearth, roast goose or turkey and a fruity pudding. But the magical story is neither Northern nor Western. Jesus was born in the Near East, and we were seeing the re-enactment of the holy night very much as it must have appeared two thousand years ago, in the Judean hills.

Every year at Christmastime the drama of the Nativity is presented in Dhahran by the Employees Association of the oil company, ARAMCO, whose administrative center is there. It is a community of 5000, the largest permanent American colony outside the United States, more recently added to by the officers, soldiers and their wives of the American air base.

Almost all the actors in this annual festival are children or teen-agers from the American schools in Dhahran, Ras at Tanura, Abqaiq (other ARAMCO centers), or from high schools as far away as Beirut, Paris or Rome, flown in by the "school bus" for the holidays.

To be picked to play the role of Mary or Joseph is the honor of the year. There were roles, however, for some seventy youngsters and a few adults.

But wise men's camels must always be led by Arabs, because camels are obstreperous beasts that few Americans can master or train. And as Arabs and Saudis the Arab participants are not Christians, but Moslems.

Saudi Arabia is entirely Moslem, and compulsorily so. No church spire raises the cross throughout its vast but scarcely populated deserts, in its few large towns, or even in the new ones built by the oil company. The only public places of worship are the domed mosques. Saudi Arabia shelters the holy places of Islam in Mecca and Medina. The king heads the Wahabi, the most rigorous and puritanical of Islamic sects, and he is president of the Islamic Council, which stretches into all Moslem lands. Certain Islamic laws are imposed upon those who live in Saudi Arabia, no matter what their origins or principles. The manufacture, importation and sale of alcoholic beverages is, for instance, forbidden as contrary to Koranic law.

Moslems count both Moses and Jesus among their three prophets, of whom they consider Mohammed the last and the greatest. A Moslem respects the religions of others and has no respect whatever for atheists, and hundreds of Arab proverbs express contempt for "the fool who says in his heart there is no God." Theirs is, I think, the purest monotheism in existence; they reject the divinity of Christ, but claim none for Mohammed. They reject Judaism as a racial religion. In their theology "There is but one God of all the universe and mankind, and Mohammed is His prophet" . . . "God was not begot nor begets." And God has no chosen people. God, in their belief, was there before the beginning of time and will be when mankind's time is ended.

To God (Allah) many human characteristics are attributed. He is "merciful, kind." But above all He is Power, awesome, inscrutable and even (to the Christian mind) arbitrary. Nothing in the universe occurs without His will. The intimate personal relation that the devout Christian feels to have with God through Christ is not, as far as I can understand, shared by the Moslems, though they prostrate themselves in prayer five times a day. And (as in Judaism) God is never depicted in painti or sculpture.

Contrary to publicized views, no Jew barred from Saudi Arabia because of his ligious faith. The ban is of political orig Saudi Arabia, like the other Arab states, co siders Israel as an alien intrusion into Ar territory at the cost of the Palestinian Ara does not recognize the state, and considers Jews, no matter what their citizenship, to probable Zionists and possible Israel ager No other Arab country goes so far in th respects.

Christendom suffers in the desert state cause it may not engage in proselytizing missionary activities, build churches or er its monuments. And the Americans, recogn ing that they are foreigners and guests, co form to the laws of the land.

But perhaps for that very reason the Am ican communities celebrate their religi festivals and services more intensely and m reverently, it seemed to me, than they do e where.

They worship at altars set up in priv homes or in the recreation center, and whet Protestant or Catholic the congregations proportion to the population are large.

Here's good news for grownups and children troubled with tooth decay

Do You Get More Than Your Share of Cavities?

BY MARGUERITE HIGGINS
Noted Journalist and Pulitzer Prize Winner

Does it seem as though you're always getting cavities?

Well, you've got lots of company!

Tooth decay strikes 95% of all Americans. Every year, we develop new cavities far faster than our dentists can fill them.

That's why you'll be excited, as I am, to learn about a new discovery that cuts cavities almost in half—for grownups and children both.

Most cavities begin in "soft spots"—weak places on tooth surfaces. Now scientists have found that a new stannous fluoride toothpaste prevents soft spots from turning into cavities.

The new toothpaste, Crest with Fluoristan, actually strengthens soft spots against decay—something no toothpaste has ever done before.

"Sounds wonderful," I said, "but how do you know Crest cuts decay?"

I was told about the Crest "in-use" testing program, in which thousands of grownups and children took part. This is the greatest testing program ever conducted on any toothpaste.

The scientists in charge of this project showed me the reports of the tests published in official dental journals.

People who brushed with Crest had far fewer new cavities than those who used ordinary toothpaste.

In one test on children (supervised by a famous university), Crest cut new decay by 49%.

In another test with grownups, Crest reduced new decay by 42%.

Many of the people who tested Crest had no new cavities at all between checkups by the dentist, I also learned. That's the happy situation which Norman Rockwell has dramatized on the opposite page.

Of course, this doesn't mean you'll never have another cavity if you brush with Crest.

But you'll certainly be far less likely to get cavities. And Crest will help keep teeth decay-free and attractive—for you and your whole family.

If you hate to have cavities filled, this is wonderful news indeed!

Questions you've asked us about CREST

How long was Crest tested?
—Mrs. Jerry Wallace, Seattle, Washington

Repeated tests were made over a 4-year period. Thousands of people took part, both grownups and children. Some brushed with Crest, others with ordinary toothpaste.

The results were checked by X-rays and dental examinations made at regular intervals by the scientists who conducted the tests.

How does Crest prevent soft spots from turning into cavities?—Mrs. Mildred Harrington, San Francisco, California

Crest with Fluoristan actually combines with and strengthens teeth against decay. This protective effect is greatest in soft spots, which are vulnerable areas on teeth where decay is likely to start.

What is Fluoristan?
—Mrs. Mary Lorick, Dedham, Massachusetts

Fluoristan* is a special fluoride formula that makes possible Crest's unique action against decay, for both children and grownups.

A DENTAL HEALTH MESSAGE FROM PROCTER & GAMBLE, MAKERS OF CREST TOOTHPASTE

"Look, Mom–no cavities!"

Crest Toothpaste stops soft spots from turning into cavities—means far less decay for grownups and children. And Crest freshens your mouth—sweetens your breath!

FRITZ HENLE

"Merry Christmas to all," says the Radio City tree.

New York at Christmastime is a friendly town. The crowds on Fifth Avenue, laden with handsome packages, smile happily at strangers: the enormous tree in Radio City beckons one and all, and the smaller trees twinkle in front of nearly every church; store windows open up fairyland. Park Avenue, lined with lighted trees, reminds us at this time of the boys who died in war, and who would have liked this memorial; carols hang in the air, the carillon; crèches are out in the open; the complacent lions in front of the Public Library wear wreaths of hemlock and balsam. It is a heart-warming interlude.

Every Christmas I find myself giving the same dearly loved old children's books. It is not fair, because some of today's books are going to be tomorrow's dearly beloved. So I'll name a few of both. But I can't help it if I get a lump in my throat over THE WIND IN THE WILLOWS, THE JUNGLE BOOK (Mowgli!), BLACK BEAUTY (still the top favorite with children) and LITTLE WOMEN (their second choice); THE TALE OF PETER RABBIT (as much a part of the very young child's life as a toothbrush), THE ADVENTURES OF TOM SAWYER and OF HUCKLEBERRY FINN (in spite of the—to me—ridiculous stand on Huckleberry Finn now taken by the New York public schools), Howard Pyle's THE MERRY ADVENTURES OF ROBIN HOOD and THE STORY OF KING ARTHUR AND HIS KNIGHTS; ALICE IN WONDERLAND, TREASURE ISLAND. It's like singing old songs together, when all the generations know the same books.

For children who have this library, because it was their mother's or grandfather's, here are a few new ones:

THE DAY THE COW SNEEZED, by James Flora (Harcourt Brace, $2.95), age 4–8; BED-KNOB AND BROOMSTICK, by Mary Norton, author of The Borrowers (Harcourt Brace, $3), age 8–12; TIME OF WONDER, by Robert McCloskey (Viking, $3.50)—a lovely book about Maine for any age; and BOY BLUE'S BOOK OF BEASTS, by William Jay Smith—delightful funny imaginative verses (Atlantic Monthly Press, $2.75).

One charming series for children with particularly beautiful French illustrations includes CINDERELLA, THE FABLES OF LA FONTAINE, SNOW WHITE (Grosset & Dunlap, $1.95 each). These books were designed in France and have a bright new spacious look.

GET AWAY FROM ME WITH THOSE CHRISTMAS GIFTS is just as it sounds—funny fresh. "There are certain things that if anyone gives them to me for Christmas I will scream." It is Sylvia Wright's pained comments on the nuisances she and all of us have to suffer through. How to be Happy Though Fired, How I Lost One-and-a-half Pounds, How to Make Chicken Pâté Once, How to Mend a Broken Heart. "Who has ever had a broken heart about the next to last person?" (McGraw-Hill, $3.75.)

James Thurber's ALARMS AND DIVERSIONS (Harper, $3.95) is a nearly complete Thurber—stories, verse, drawings, dogs, seals, lions, people with resigned expressionless faces. It needs no word from me. But if you don't happen to know The Last Flower, a Parable in Pictures, then buy the book for yourself!

THE GLUYAS WILLIAMS GALLERY (Harper, $4.95) is also funny—twenty-five of his drawings plus gems by Ed Streeter, Bob Benchley, Corey Ford, Laurence McKinney, David McCord, all with Williams' illustrations.

Bennett Cerf has eschewed humor as such this time for a particularly rewarding anthology: READING FOR PLEASURE (Harper, $4.95). He has omitted the stories that you can find blindfold in almost every other anthology, and has honestly included only what he himself has read with pleasure and remembered, from Carson to Capote, from Meredith to Marquand by way of Mansfield and Michener, Coppard, Canfield, Collier.

For gran'pa and gran'ma, the nostalgic type, there's THE OLD FARMER'S ALMANAC (Ives Washburn, $5). "Fair words butter no parsnips."

For the man who needs a few pointers, try THE EDUCATION OF A POKER PLAYER (Simon & Schuster, $3.50). This is by Herbert O. Yardley, the man who broke the Japanese cipher in 1919, a man with a mind for mathematics who has won at poker consistently since he was 16. This is his story complete with Five-Card Draw, Seven-Card Stud, Seven Card Hi-Lo, Table Stakes, and a background of the Far West and Chungking.

For men not interested in poker: HAMMOND'S WEATHER KIT (Hammond & Co., Maplewood, N. J., $1), with a map and a chart and a "weather wheel" which predicts the weather, given a certain wind, the way "time wheels" tell you the time all over the world.

COLLIER'S

JACK MARKOW

"A child can put it together if his father lets him alone."

And for yourself, when Christmas gets to be more than you can take, here are two good detective stories:

IF DEATH EVER SLEPT (Viking, $2.95) is one of Rex Stout's best Nero Wolfe yarns. And DEATH OF A POSTMAN, by John Creasy (Harper, $2.95) is the very best by that author that I have read—and he writes fifteen a year!

MERRY CHRISTMAS!

Should parents fear teen-age idols?

BOB WILLOUGHBY

There's a degree of satisfaction for teen-agers whose heroes irritate their parents.

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

"It's a mistake for parents to interpret the responses of adolescent girls according to adult standards."

There are a variety of ways in which teen-agers bother their parents. The one that I'm thinking of today is the infatuation that millions of girls declare for one singer or movie actor or another. Some parents of each decade think that this is a new affliction and wonder what has come over the younger generation. But this kind of mass adoration has been taking place off and on for many years. I suppose that in earlier generations—before TV, radio, movies and phonograph records—conditions did not favor such nationwide epidemics. In cities, though, certain matinee idols of the stage drew the same kind of frantic enthusiasm.

Adults read with amazement about long lines of adolescents waiting for hours outside the theater before the star appears, then greeting every step of his performance with tumultuous applause. They become uneasy when they hear of girls shrieking and sobbing and swooning. If they see a performance themselves on TV or film, they may, in certain cases, be disgusted. City officials and other groups have got so mad and alarmed that they have even tried to keep a performer from coming to town.

There are a number of aspects of adolescence that help to explain this phenomenon. I want to talk first about emotional and sexual development in general—and particularly in boys, because I remember it so well. I'll come back to girls later.

In the 3-to-5-year-old period, boys and girls go through a stage of emotional development in which there is considerable interest in romance and sex, at a childish level. They love to play at being father and mother and taking care of their pretend children. Boys develop a particularly intense romantic attachment to their mothers and often speak of marrying them. Normal girls feel the same way about their fathers. Boys and girls are apt to become involved in sex play with each other and with themselves.

We've learned from psychiatric work that children become somewhat anxious and guilty about their sexual interests by the time they are 5 or 6 years old, partly because of parental disapproval, partly because of rivalry with the parents and partly because of misunderstandings about the physical differences between boys and girls. It's a complex matter which I'll discuss some other time. Anyway, they come to think of sex as bad and dangerous, to some degree, and they make vigorous efforts to suppress their interest in it. This period of intense repression lasts from about the age of 6 to the beginning of puberty development, which comes at 11 years for the average girl and 13 for the average boy. The repression is so successful that, by the age of 9 or 10 years, most boys declare loudly that girls are silly, irritating and repulsive. Girls retaliate by agreeing that boys are impossibly rough and mean, which they often are. (Of course the persistence with which the sexes scorn each other and tease each other at this age shows that they still retain considerable interest in each other, underneath.)

The glandular changes of puberty which bring about a rather violent reawakening of personal and sexual feelings have to work against these deeply ingrained habits of repression. As a result, the child often does not recognize the feelings for what they are at first and he continues to try to ignore them for some time afterward. We have come to realize, through psychoanalysis and psychology, that he partially understands them in his unconscious mind, yet largely fails to understand them consciously. What conscious knowledge he does have is kept vague and confused by the tension in his feelings, compounded as they are of excitement, inhibition and guiltiness. Altogether, sex is more uncomfortable than pleasurable in the early stages of adolescence.

There are a number of different attitudes that will later blend together to create a mature romantic love: companionableness, protectiveness, joy in planning the future together, as well as sexual attraction. But in the young adolescent they are not ripening at the same rate and they don't mix smoothly. So his friendliness may go out to one girl, his chivalry to another and his sexual interest to a third.

Many boys have acquired such a strong conviction that sex is bad that they are unable to feel any sexual interest at first toward the "nice" girls for whom they feel respect or tenderness. They can only respond in this way to girls who seem "bad." This division of love into two compartments, and the division of the opposite sex into two categories, occurs to varying degrees in many girls at first too. (In a few individuals of both sexes it persists into adulthood and of course makes for serious marital problems.)

The adolescent slowly gains sexual maturity by becoming more accustomed to his new self, step by step, and also by becoming romantically interested in a succession of girls. Through them he learns not only about girls, but about himself.

As a matter of fact, the boy's most intense feelings of admiration may go out, in the very first stage of puberty, not to a girl—who is still taboo—but to a male teacher, or coach or hero. Many girls have crushes on revered women at this stage too. When a boy does get up the courage to think romantically about girls, he may find it much safer to daydream about an adventure with a faraway movie actress than with a home-town girl whom he might run into an hour later. Even after he realizes that he is interested in a girl nearby he may be quite content for months merely to think about her and make no move to speak to her or show his feelings.

His first love may be a choice which baffles his family and friends. They can detect no visible common interest on which it could be based. As time goes on, his preferences are apt to become more realistic and longer lasting. But it's only after a number of years that he is ready to recognize the girl who will be right for him for life and be able to offer her the combination of mature attitudes that will make him right for her.

Perhaps you think I'm laying it on too thick, in the picture I've been drawing of bashfulness and bewilderment. There are some boys and girls who—even from the very beginning of adolescence—approach the opposite sex with apparent suavity. (In fact, there are a few children, brought up delinquently, who never develop any sexual inhibitions even in the 6-to-12-year-old period.) I suspect, though, that the sophisticated early adolescents are good actors who are really less sure of themselves than they seem. But when they succeed in their bluffing they gain real confidence quickly. The timid ones aren't able to take advantage of the opportunities that would teach them more assurance.

Even if I have been giving a lopsided picture by emphasizing the more inhibited type of early adolescent, the points that I have been making are basically true of almost every normal teen-ager to a greater or lesser degree.

Now we can get back to the response of girls in their early teens to the love songs and other seductive approaches of the singers and actors of the moment. Of course different personalities appeal to different girls. There is also the element of fashion, which makes one type particularly acceptable for a few years, and then another—just like clothes. There are the strong silent man, the wholesome boy, the tough guy, the wistful boy who seems to need mothering, the sexy male. Whatever the type, they all have the advantage that they can be dreamed about, to the heart's content, without ever having to be coped with. A girl in her imagination can have the idol say or do anything she wants, and she herself can be irresistible. No risk of being spurned because she is unattractive or of being tongue-tied or of having the actor prove hard to manage. (During a trip abroad in 1924 on a college athletic team, my friends and I managed to get ourselves introduced to Gloria Swanson, the reigning movie queen. But in an agonizing full circuit of the dance floor on the ocean liner I couldn't find one single word to say to her, even though she graciously tried to help me.)

What parents find particularly hard to take is the sexual suggestiveness of an occasional performer who has no appeal to them at all, and—harder still—the evidence that many of the girls are responding in the same spirit. The adults are repelled by the publicness and the wholesaleness of this kind of wooing. They are disturbed that girls of supposed discrimination, at an age of supposed innocence, will adore such an inappropriate person. Fathers and other male citizens are also probably jealous of so phenomenally successful a lover.

But parents are mistaken when they interpret the responses of adolescent girls according to their own adult standards. I think there are three principal reasons, seemingly paradoxical, why a wholesome teen-age girl can respond to a performer who is offensive to her parents. She isn't actually doing anything wrong—she's just dreaming. The fact that he shows no noble side to his nature gets around any inhibition she may have against associating sex with a good person—he can just be a symbol of fascinating badness. At the very same time, the girl's relative innocence—as far as her conscious mind is concerned—allows her not to recognize what the performer is implying, and how she is responding at a subconscious level. This keeps her conscience clear.

You might say (perhaps inaccurately) that a girl can swoon in a theater only because she is not yet mature enough to swoon in the right boy's arms. After she has had the experience of being thoroughly in love with a real person she will have only a mild interest in a symbol of heavy romance on the stage.

Why don't boys carry on about sirens in the way girls do about male singers? To a much milder degree they do. Boys of all ages have their enthusiasm for one popular seductress or another. But boys from early childhood have been taught to control and hide their feelings. I think that they also recognize their sexual feelings for what they are at an earlier stage of adolescence and so are less likely to reveal them ingenuously. Probably more important still is the fact that, to the average male, sex is predominantly a matter of initiative and activity rather than of passive response. He may be intrigued by a suggestive actress, but he won't be completely carried away by a performance in which he plays no active part.

There are other factors that clinch the popularity of an idol of the teen-agers. They have a strong herd instinct. This is partly because each one is somewhat frightened by his changed body, changed interests, changed feelings. He is so strange to himself that he wonders at times whether he is normal. He craves to find similarities in hobbies, tastes, ideals with others his age. Erik Erikson, a profound student of adolescence, has pointed out that each individual at this age really finds himself in his friends. He is amazed and relieved and delighted when he discovers that someone else likes the same book, hates the same teacher, responds to the same music, has come to a similar philosophy of life. This need to share thoughts helps to explain why two girls who have been together all day and who have just parted rush to their phones to resume confidences. So if an adolescent girl can adore the same man that five million other girls adore, she feels sure she's normal, no matter what her parents may say.

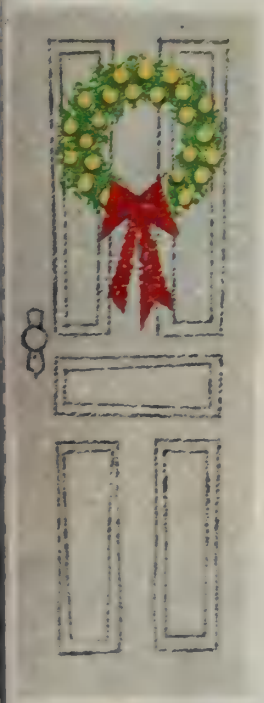
CONFUCIUS SAYS

There are three degrees of filial piety. The highest is being a credit to our parents; the second is not disgracing them; the lowest is being able simply to support them.

There is no one who does not eat and drink. But few there are who really know flavor.

Worry not that no one knows of you; seek to be worth knowing.

And then if several thousand devotees are gathered in the presence of the idol in a theater, mass hysteria adds a pleasurable frenzy to the whole affair.



Another aspect of the herdlike behavior of teen-agers is their isolation from other age groups. They are trying hard to outgrow their own childishness, so they prefer to think of themselves as not children at all. Yet they are not really accepted into the adult world—at least not in our kind of civilization. In many simpler societies, adolescents go through certain initiation rites and then assume a dignified role in the life of the community, doing the same work as adults and participating in important ceremonies. Even in America colonial times some young men held positions of real responsibility by the age of 21. But in America today we keep our adolescents in schools and colleges for years, where they go on learning more about the techniques of our civilization, with little opportunity to feel that they are full-fledged members of it. They not only don't hold regular jobs, they usually have to live on allowances from their parents and submit to their judgment and authority. Our children agree with us that this is wrong. But psychologically it keeps them from feeling grown up and it keeps them rebellious. Often they make a virtue of their isolation from the adult world. They invent their own styles of dress and hairdo. They develop a language of their own. Rather hectically they foster their own hobbies and enthusiasms. They delight in having their own special idols in the field of entertainment. Then if it turns out that their idols happen to irritate their elders, they have achieved an additional success and satisfaction.

Before I stop I'd better be sure that in my efforts to be reassuring I haven't misled some readers. I certainly don't mean that any degree of infatuation with an actor or hysteria in a theater is normal. In fact, there must be some highly unstable girls in the audience I read about. I only mean that a teen-ager can be a thoroughly wholesome person in other respects and still proclaim her love for a performer objectionable to her parents. This doesn't mean her judgment is not good in other respects, nor does it mean she won't outgrow discrimination in regard to men later on.

But perhaps the reason I can be so philosophical is that I have no daughters.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.

More doubts than usual plague a man searching for a job—when he is an ex-mental patient. "Will they like me, will they hire me when they find out about the past?" he wonders.

DO WE GIVE THE MENTALLY ILL A CHANCE?

. . . How San Francisco Helps

"Strength From the Earth"

By MARGARET HICKEY

The people who study and treat mental illness often use a jargon puzzling to the average citizen. But at Northport Veterans Hospital on Long Island, New York, there is no mystery about one treatment that is helping many patients find their way back to reality. It can be described by one word—gardening.

On an afternoon when it is too cold to go outdoors, a group of men, some of them just admitted to the hospital, will crowd around a table in a recreation room. The table is covered with yellow and bronze chrysanthemums, bits of green ribbon and wire. Two women in crisp blue uniforms expertly wind the wire around the stems, tie a bow with the ribbon and invite the men to try their hand at corsage making. Not everyone does it perfectly the first time, but their eyes reflect pleasure at their achievement.

The two women are volunteers from the Centerport Garden Club, who give at least one afternoon a week to teaching the men how to plant and transplant (when the weather is warm), how to care for their plants in the greenhouse and how to make flower arrangements and exhibits for flower shows. Altogether, some 98 women from Long Island garden clubs come in to help with these activities. "It doesn't matter what you look like, or how old you are or what you say," one attractive, gray-haired volunteer has discovered; "they just seem to enjoy your company."

And there are never enough volunteers in such programs—simply because people with the necessary skills in gardening, or in music or art or drama, do not understand mental illness and how much help a normal activity can be. Volunteers at Northport have watched hostile, aggressive patients take a hoe and hack away at grass and weeds in the field, return more subdued and less angry. Other patients, suffering from tension, become relaxed and co-operative after digging in the garden. Volunteers have also seen withdrawn and mute men suddenly express joy at the first tiny sprout from a seed they themselves have planted. And they know of many success stories. Altogether, some 41 patients have left the hospital permanently to take jobs as nurserymen and landscape gardeners, while a number of other discharged patients have taken up gardening as a lifetime hobby.

Lack of love, lack of security in their lives have driven many of these patients into a world of dreams where they are boss and never rebuffed. "But man started from the earth," Dr. Arnold A. Schillinger, the hospital's manager, believes, "and when in trouble is able to derive strength from the earth. At times, though, he may need a little assistance." That is the job of the gardening volunteers.

END

Bob S. walked slowly down the street, disappointment shadowing his face. "I'm awfully sorry I can't offer you the job," the woman office manager had said apologetically, "but the boss doesn't want to take the chance."

It wasn't much of a job at that—stock clerk in a shipping company—but Bob, twenty-eight years old and muscular, knew he could handle it and he had wanted it. He turned homeward. His mother would have lunch ready by now, and she would be waiting to ask in her kind, overconcerned way how things had gone.

Three months ago when Bob left the state mental hospital he had had only one thought: to grow in strength and confidence so that he'd never have to go back. He remembered that resolution now and turned into a large department store. In the personnel office he picked up a long application form. There was a space to list every school he had ever attended, every job he had ever filled. Bob laid the application back on the table and walked out. Nobody, he decided, was going to sit behind a closed door and, without so much as looking at him, turn him down.

The San Francisco Association for Mental Health can tell you about other Bobs—young men, and women too—who have come out of mental institutions full of hope, trying to act brave, but underneath scared at the prospect of competing in the world, wondering if people will like them, will give them jobs, what they'll think when they find out about the past. Readjustment is not easy, but the San Francisco Association, a citizens' organization with some 2500 members affiliated with the United Bay Area Crusade, is trying to smooth the way from convalescence to employment.

While still recovering in wards of hospitals, patients meet volunteers from the community—recruited and trained by the Association for Mental Health—who bring warm companionship at a time when it is needed most. Upon discharge, many join the Mental Health Association sponsored Fellowship Club, an organization of ex-mental patients who help one another through those first frightening weeks "on their own."

In job hunting, perhaps, ex-patients meet the most formidable obstacle of all. In the bigger organizations, particularly, where applicants are screened first through written forms, some personnel people flinch at the words "mental illness." ("A broken leg they can see and understand," one job seeker reported; "mental illness frightens them.") Instead of a chance at a personal interview, then, the ex-mental patient may get only a polite "Sorry, no openings at this time."

San Francisco's Association for Mental Health is trying to change this attitude. Once each month its Employment Committee invites personnel directors of a dozen large companies to meet and talk with a recovered mental patient about his illness, abilities and efforts to get work. It is not a job-finding clinic (the State Employment Service and the Bureau of Vocational Rehabilitation provide actual placement service), but rather an educational program to show employers that they are not "taking a chance" by hiring a former mental patient—that he is a rational human being able to hold a job.

"Many of you have ex-mental patients on your payroll right now, only you don't know it," Larry Loban, chairman of the committee and a personnel man himself, tells the men solemnly gathered around the table in the association's conference room. "Some lie about their past experience or take lower-paying jobs where screening is less rigid." It is noon, and a secretary quietly sets a cup of coffee and a wax-paper-wrapped sandwich and slice of cake in front of each chair. The tension eases as Mr. Loban makes introductions.

"Can we ask this patient we're going to talk to anything about his illness?" a thoughtful-looking man in a brown suit wants to know.

"Yes," Mr. Loban answers. "The social workers say Bob S. is willing to tell his story because he wants to help people understand mental illness so that they will give ex-patients a chance to start over again. Bob S. has just found a job—but here he is now."

Bob quickly takes a place at the table. His social worker from the state Mental Hygiene Clinic, an alert, gray-haired woman, is at his side. At a nod from Mr. Loban, Bob S. tells about his unsuccessful attempts to locate a job, his feeling of shame at having to tell about his hospitalization. "But last week I finally got a job—and it was the first time I didn't mention I'm an ex-mental patient."

There are many questions. How did he get this job? is one. "I saw a sign in a window, 'Stock Boy Wanted,' and went in. I guess they were pretty desperate for somebody, because they just asked me a couple of questions and hired me on the spot."

Since May, 1955, when these employment discussions began, some 200 employers—representing the fields of retailing, banking, manufacturing, public relations—have met more than 30 former patients, talked with them about hospital and psychiatric care, problems of returning to the community. "Most employers have only a hazy idea of what a former mental patient is like," Mr. Loban has discovered. "Through our discussions they find the ex-patients talk well, are nicely groomed, have job skills. Most important of all, the employers seem to go away with the conviction that a mental patient should be considered chiefly on the basis of whether he can do the job."

Just knowing that many personnel people are meeting face to face with the problems of mental illness helps bolster Fellowship Club members with confidence. Though Bob and others have been driven by desperation to conceal their illness, nearly all feel it best to tell prospective employers the truth. They want acceptance as they are and they want to be free from fear of being found out in a lie. Many of the members are not ready for jobs yet, but are looking forward to the day when they will be.

Janet, a pretty blonde who became ill while in college, has been studying typing and shorthand and doing volunteer office work at the Y.W.C.A. two days a week. Another member, a young man who has spent ten years in institutions, is working part time—without pay—at a neighborhood gasoline station until he feels confident enough to take a paying job. John's "employer" understands what has happened, makes sure that he never works under pressure and excuses him for clinic appointments.

One of the first steps in readjustment is making friends—understanding friends who will accept the former patient as a human being. This was the reason Fellowship Club was founded. Because so few people do understand mental illness, club members derive courage from one another. One man, before the club was formed, wanted companionship so badly he joined Alcoholics Anonymous, though he was not an alcoholic. A young girl, bored with being at home and dependent upon her parents, told a new acquaintance that when she comes to the club she does not feel like herself at all, but like a "person."

Members meet every Friday night at Mission Community Center for discussions, dancing, crafts and parties. A committee of volunteers stands ready to help provide refreshments, decorations or theater tickets upon request. But usually the only nonmember present is Miss Sara Boddinghouse, a psychiatric social worker at San Mateo Hospital, who quietly and unobtrusively "directs" the activities.

Even before these people are well enough to leave the hospital, the Association for Mental Health is thinking of their future. Every month some 150 volunteers trained by the association spend more than 700 hours with mental patients and thereby help scores of them to find their way back to the community and become self-supporting citizens.

At first a number of the volunteers show the same lack of knowledge about mental illness as the personnel men. "Will I be in any danger?" is a frequently asked question at the orientation sessions volunteers attend before being assigned to a hospital activity.

"Of course not," is the ready answer given by Mrs. Joan Fell Murray, the young and attractive executive director of the Association for Mental Health. "In the first place," she explains, "most of the mentally ill are quiet and unexcited people. Only a few are overactive and violent, and only a very small number dangerous. An attendant will be there at all times—but your presence will mean for many the first step back into normal society."

The wards at San Francisco Hospital, once glum and "morgue-quiet," as one patient described them, before volunteers were allowed in, bustle with life as the patients get ready for Tuesday- and Friday-night parties. On those evenings, nearly three dozen members of two dancing clubs and various business people come to twirl about the floor, serve refreshments or just chat. Before th

We asked Ogden Nash . . .

FRED FEHL

Ogden Nash

"WHY AREN'T WOMEN MORE LIKE MEN?"

FRED FEHL

Rex Harrison

Challenged by Rex Harrison's wonderful song in My Fair Lady, we posed the questions it contained to one of the wittiest men in America.

Are women unpredictable?
No, only by men.

Are men really so noble and kind?
I am.

Why are women thought to be so enigmatic, impossible to understand?
Who understands who, anyhow?

Is the company of men really more pleasant? Are most men more at ease in the company of men?
Certainly. Hence the whaling industry.

Why can't a woman be more of a chum?
What lad in the Beaver Troop posed this poser?

Do most women really only want to talk of love?
No. Men want to talk of love, women immediately talk about moving the furniture around.

If given a chance, will a woman usually try to overhaul a man? (As well as redecorate his home?)
Yes, and he will reciprocate. We all love our own image, and especially our own convenience.

Why are women never ready to go out when you are?
No bubbles in my bath.

Have women asked your advice, then done exactly what they wanted to do?
Yes, and so has John Foster Dulles.

Do women complain more?
More than Ted Williams?

Why do people say that women are so calculating?
They have had to be, to survive.

Is it true that women are generally jealous and suspicious?
Only of men and each other.

Do women always want to do as others do? Like clothes, for instance.
They want to be the same, only different and better.

Why do women do everything their mothers did? Why don't they grow up more like their fathers instead?
My father-in-law has a mustache. I like things the way they are.

Do women spend more time straightening their hair than straightening out their souls inside?
The operations are concurrent.

Are men always friendly, good natured, better companions?
Maybe in Texas.

Did you ever know a woman who was logical?
Women would rather be right than reasonable.

If slighted, have you known women who wouldn't speak for hours?
After they have spoken for hours, yes.

What about the myth of men being more prompt?
Please learn to distinguish between myth and fact.

Why do you imagine women are always losing their gloves?
The plural is wrong. They lose them one at a time.

Why do you suppose men never cry?
Wrong again. I'm still crying over Black Beauty.

Do women vacillate so much?
*Lady Mary Wortley Montagu's vacillation stopped smallpox.

By and large, are we a marvelous sex?
Who is we? There are those who think any sex is marvelous.

Can you understand women at all?
If I did, I'd be a fool to admit it.

*Lady Montagu, after living in Turkey as the ambassador's wife for several years, brought the practice of vaccination to England in 171

Can happiness be based on deceit?

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

ONE MORE TRIANGLE

"Can you help me with a complicated problem? Two years ago, when I was twenty and he was thirty, I met Charles and we started dating. After we'd been going steady for two months, he told me he was married and had two children. I was greatly shocked, and my parents forbade me to see him. But I was in love with him, and he persuaded me to go on seeing him secretly.

"After a few months, I couldn't stand the worry and deceit any longer, so I took a job in another city. Charles besieged me with letters and gifts, and begged me to come home. I didn't answer, but I couldn't forget him, even though I was seeing other men. Finally, a year ago I wrote him that everything was over between us, and soon after started dating Tony.

"Charles made several attempts to see me, offering to drive the six hundred miles, but I refused. My disillusionment and hurt strengthened my resolution when I learned that his wife had been pregnant when he first started dating me. Tony wanted us to become engaged, and I tried to persuade myself I loved him. But it was no go, and I broke off with him after a few months.

"Then I went home on vacation. When I saw Charles, for the first time in eight months, it was like reaching the end of a long journey. It is not all physical attraction, for there is a sharing of interests I have never known with anyone else.

"Charles says his wife's bad temper and jealousy make his life miserable and he no longer loves her. Though our religion forbids divorce we both feel there is no other way out. He hopes to start proceedings soon, so that we can be married.

"I haven't told my family that we are dating again, because I dread hurting them. Charles' parents will disapprove, and I'm afraid his children will suffer. Charles thinks everything can be worked out, and I hope so. But will I always feel guilty as I do now? I need the advice of someone who can see the situation objectively. I pray that you can help me find a sound and sensible solution."

Theresa's problem is a familiar version of the triangle. Like many other single girls who have become involved with married men, she already knows that what she is doing is wrong, and unlikely to bring happiness to anyone, including herself. But so far, she hasn't had the strength to end the situation. Perhaps a review of the facts as they appear to an outsider will help her find the courage she needs.

First, Charles must solve the problem of his existing marriage and the future of his children. If he were honest with himself and responsible in his attitude toward Theresa, he would leave her alone until he was a free man.

Second, can he ever be a free man? There are no grounds for divorce, unless his wife brings action based on his conduct with Theresa. The religion of all three people and their families makes it very unlikely that she will. (And can Theresa be sure that the man whose relationship with her was based on deceit from the beginning is being honest now about his intentions?)

In addition, economics must be considered. Charles has his hands full supporting his family at present (as a second letter from Theresa made clear); his income is not adequate to provide for two families.

There are other negative factors. An age difference of ten years is often a considerable handicap. The disapproval of family and friends gets any marriage off to a poor start. If Theresa marries Charles, she will have to share her husband's income, time and attention with his first wife and their children. Under these conditions, she, too, may become bad-tempered, jealous and possessive.

There is only one sound and sensible solution, and in her heart Theresa already knows it. Not only for the happiness of others, but for her own as well, she must give Charles up, once and for all. She is not a girl who can live happily with a guilty conscience.

If she can make this decision firmly, decisively and without lingering doubts, she will find peace of mind sooner than she thinks. Once she forgets Charles, she will find it easier to become interested in other men. Among them she will find one with whom she can build a better, happier marriage than she could hope for with Charles.

THIS WIFE SAVED HER MARRIAGE

Four years ago a troubled wife of twenty-eight, married six years, poured out her story to me. Her husband maintained that his first obligations were to his mother, with whom they lived. He refused to leave her to set up a home of their own. Her decisions were final, and his wife's wishes granted only if approved by his mother. The couple's two children were being reared as their grandmother directed. The wife felt frustrated at every turn.

She said, "Three weeks ago we moved out bag and baggage and left him with his mother. He and I are both unhappy. He loves me, and I love him except after a fight over his mother. But he won't give in and I can't. What should I do?"

We discussed the possibilities. Divorce or formal separation she ruled out because of the children and the love between her and her husband. But she was not ready to return to her husband under the same old circumstances. Though she realized that this indefinite arrangement could not continue permanently, she decided to stay away a few more weeks, to wait and see what happened.

Christmas Eve she and her husband together decorated the children's tree and arranged the presents, almost in silence. Then, after a tearful embrace, he returned to his mother. He had Christmas dinner with his wife and children, spent the rest of the day with his mother. Ten days later he moved in with his wife and children. This lasted two days. Then his mother had a mild heart attack, and he returned to her.

Another month passed. The wife said, "What am I to do? I can't have a normal life away from him, or with him and his mother." At this point, many wives would have ended the marriage. But she decided to swallow her pride and return to her husband. I neither opposed nor recommended her action, as she had to make the decision.

The wife wrote regularly, and about every three months drove down to talk matters over. (The husband refused to come in to see me.) She lost weight, became haggard and nervous, seldom smiled. Two or three times she almost gave up the struggle: "Each day seems to bring new problems. My mind gets so confused I can't think clearly about anything." Again, "The pressures are so great that I don't see how I can stand them much longer."

Months passed. Her husband continued to tolerate his wife's position as virtually a servant. As she became more and more run-down, I grew seriously concerned about her health.

Then the mother contracted pneumonia. Throughout a long illness and convalescence, the wife nursed her devotedly, in spite of their past differences.

At last came a solution. A widowed cousin wrote to the mother asking her to share her home in Florida. The doctor urged the change, and in spring she left, for good.

But the wife came to me in acute distress. "Last week, I suddenly realized that I no longer love my husband. Whatever hope I had is gone. Now when we at last have a chance to try to find each other, I am too tired to try. I'm afraid to look ahead."

Since her children were in school, I encouraged her to find work outside her home, as one way of restoring her interest in life and bolstering her self-confidence. (This was a year ago.) With many misgivings, she undertook to do so.

It was an uphill fight. Her first job was poorly paid and exhausting. But she didn't give up. She used her pay to refurbish her wardrobe, and began to pay attention to her appearance. Her health and spirits improved. Excerpts from letters written over a period of months tell the story of gradual, hard-won improvement.

"I am sure I will lose my job, I make too many mistakes." . . . "I am terribly inefficient but believe I am improving." . . . "I did get the new job, but I'm afraid I'll never live up to your recommendation." . . . "It is still difficult to feel close to my husband, but at least I don't pull away when he touches me." . . . "I haven't put away all hope of again loving my husband." . . . "Things are going better. I doubt if he will ever understand me, but he now accepts me for what I am."

Her last letter, it seems to me, has a message which every unhappy wife (or husband) might well ponder for the inspiration inherent in it:

"My life today presents no big problems. No one is ever completely free from worries and little fears. It is a miracle how much my husband has changed. He and I are living a richer, happier life than I believed possible. After our experience, I cannot help feeling almost any marriage can be saved if either the husband or wife is willing to work hard enough and long enough. I am so thankful that I never lost sight of the man I knew my husband could be. The thing that helped me most these last few months was the rich reward in giving love and happiness. It is like a snowball, it grows as you go along. You must give richly if you are to receive richly."

There are not many such letters in my files. But those few tell of victories over alcoholism, infidelity, dishonesty and imprisonment, and other acute misfortunes. Above all, they tell of wives like this one, whose bravery, sacrifice and loyalty preserved their homes, restored their husbands and protected their children.

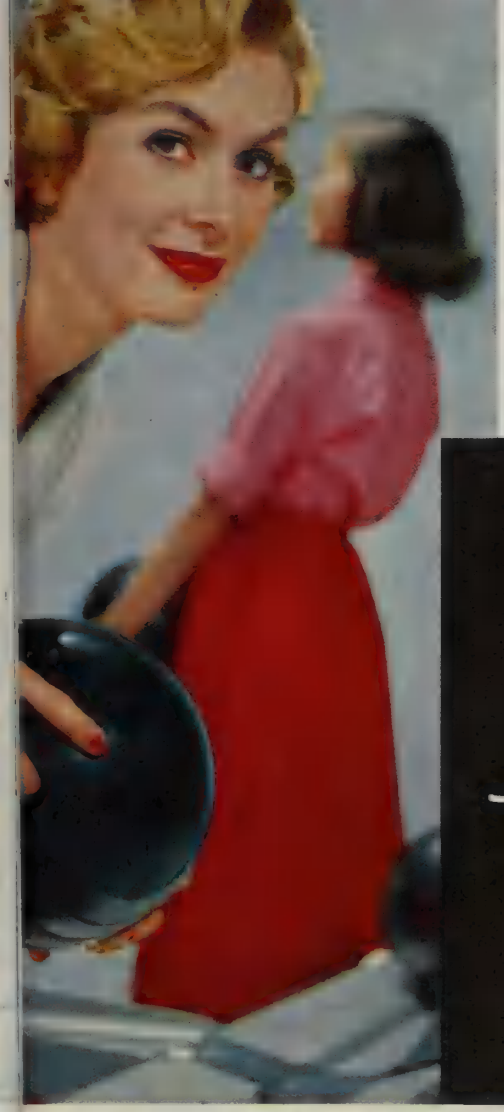
During this Christmas season, if you are beset by a trying problem and feel like giving up, why not take a moment out to make sure that you have tried "long enough and hard enough"?

DO YOU AGREE?

"My husband is an awful grouch when he arises in the morning. What can I do about it?"

Talk as little as possible and feed him quickly.

ASK YOURSELF:



Are We a United Family?
Do We Live as a Real Family?

A very reliable measure of your family's success and stability is the way its members feel and behave toward one another. Think through each question carefully before answering "Yes" or "No" to these questions about family relationships.

As a Rule, Do We:

1. Have pride in one another?
2. Act considerately and generously?
3. Talk over family problems freely?
4. Strive for a pleasant, cheerful home?
5. Work and play together as a family?
6. Share the car without squabbling?
7. All usually eat at the same time?
8. Celebrate each person's birthday?
9. Take an interest in religious activities?
10. Respect one another's personal privacy?
11. All do our share of household tasks?
12. Notice and praise each member's accomplishments?
13. Encourage every member's special interests?
14. Co-operate when the going is tough?

These simple questions deal with the character and heart of your family. If your "Yes" answers totaled 12 or more, it is almost certain that you have a united family and a happy marriage. The average family scores 9 or 10. If your score is 7 or less, something is wrong. The first approach is to seek more understanding and better co-operation with your husband.

Doing your share in P.T.A., civic and church projects? It's important to get out and do things, easier than you think.

Shopping where buys are best? Trips to salon or supermarket needn't wait for husband's free time. It pays to be on your own with a Plymouth.

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"Say, this is exactly the way you've been treating me."

All I want for Christmas: assurance that it's manly to shave sitting down. Why do we foolish men shave standing up? This rebellion comes as I watch my Dream Girl relaxed at her dressing table.

We paid a sentimental family visit to all three, and found collegians thicker at Nantucket, tourists thicker at Cape Cod, lobster stew thicker at Martha's Vineyard. Ah, these blessed isles!

Maybe we've made some progress: what we once called a whoopee room and later a playroom is now the family room. (And it's no quieter!)

"I try to let Peter have his way," pouts Betty Comfort, wrapping a package for overseas, "but he wanted to put 'There is no solution, seek it lovingly' on our Christmas cards, so I told him to put it on his valentines."

About snow shoveling, the boy next door has been neutral until he tried to dribble a basketball all the way to school. Now he's indignant at people with sloppy sidewalks.

Our little group of occasional thinkers argued at lunch whether Hemingway's unsmiling sophomore heroes are as lifelike as Cozzens' people. We agreed we'd feel more at home for a weekend with a Cozzens group, and then ordered pie à la mode.

On a slushy holiday evening we feel so blithe because at this season our dourest friends reveal rather than conceal their love for all. Nor is it brazen now to wind up a chat with a "God bless!"

For a few weeks I was proud of mailing several presents in August, marked "Do not open till Christmas." Now I wonder whether human nature is equal to leaving 'em unopened more than a hundred days.

In some parts of the country we found the "poor boy" sandwich now costs $1, up from 35 cents a few years ago. Some of the splendid types who can afford 'em no longer have an appetite for a small loaf of bread fat with fillers.

My Lady of Sheer Delight gets bored and vexed with all the prizes, awards and citations for all sorts of inflated exploits. "I'd like to give a Pulitzer prize to a flawless motel," she murmurs, "and an Oscar for a perfect roadside breakfast."

I detect a strong surface current of opposition among teen-agers in our block to the proposal for eleven months of school and a mere two weeks' summer vacation. "You grownups," one reminds me, "would have to trim your vacations!"

Except under the spell of my Dream Girl's zest for sea food, I think a good dish of bacon or ham and eggs beats lobster nine times out of ten. A rassle with a lobster's crimson carcass is often an ordeal for the smidgens of meat you get.

One of our town's architects tells me Frank Lloyd Wright plans to crown his career with a design for a $37,000 prefab house for the common man. Gosh, there'll be dancing in the slum streets tonight!

"I hear they pay bills only three or four times a year in Europe," says Peter Comfort (who worries about inflation) at our wind-blown bus stop. "Maybe we could buy Christmas presents at a forty-seven-cent dollar and pay for 'em later with forty-five-cent dollars."

In our crowd the topic to draw people together most quickly was children. But lately the discussion of our fathers and mothers in their eighties is even more poignant and unifying.

I saw so many men in Bermuda shorts this year that I suspect long pants are obsolescent. In fact, by the year 2000 even bankers may go to work in shorts in clement weather.

At the bridge table our dearest friends bickered about their ungodly quantity of luggage on their last motor trip. "Either we cut down," warned the ruddy husband, who had most of it, "or we'll take two cars."

At Christmas my father invariably attempted resolutely to stop us from buying him presents. "I have everything I need!" he'd exclaim. But vainly. The gifts he liked he'd lock in his trunk; the others he'd secretly return to the stores.

At Thanksgiving the freshman halfway down the block told me it's now O.K. to wear Ivy League clothes at State College. "We got official sanction," he said. "It's a real feather in our little caps."

Another thing I envy the Cape Codders is their lawns of pine needles. I've tried water grass and concrete paving (tennis courts, shuffleboard alleys, wide driveways), but they aren't as pretty.

"These coffee breaks!" snorts a passionate boss in our town. "How wasteful." What really irks him, he admits, is that he runs head on into the morning coffee break when he arrives at his office, stumbles over the mid-afternoon breather when he flees his desk to go home. Splendid type.

As a father myself, I'm embarrassed when the family goes all out with presents for me at Christmas. Dads I know say they'd rather give 'em than get 'em, especially when they're all charged to dad's account anyhow.

On our last jaunt to Florida we found 'em emulating the Californians with heated swimming pools a few steps from the ocean's edge. And the water's much warmer along Florida's shores, so it must be merely the American way.

This time maybe I can economize by not buying a big red potted poinsettia for our holiday living room. Mine is always the smallest of the three we've got every Christmas for the last fifteen years.

How come I revealed that a poem by Edna Millay hangs over my shaving mirror? Absent-minded of me. Yet to quizzers I'm not ashamed to admit it's called "Elaine." I cut the page (illustrated by Rockwell Kent) from a magazine and framed it before I was married.

Each time I visit Martha's Vineyard I learn something. This time at least two new things: (1) swordfish steak should be cooked mostly on one side; and (2) leftover swordfish makes a fine casserole dish. (Better jot that down, wife.)

. . . When a tiny grandson 2000 miles away prattles over the long-distance phone,

. . . Or a teen-age son calls you "sir" twice in one day,

. . . And your daughter-in-law writes from Japan that Junior after a fifteen-hour flight feeds their infant its bottle,

. . . Or your Dream Girl cooks better by recipe than her grandma cooked by instinct,

Then you confess inwardly you've got it golden, you battle-scarred cynic, and can abandon that inscrutable mask.

Journal ABOUT TOWN

Gossip about people you know, editors you like,
and what goes on in New York

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

America's Navy came of age in December, 1907, when (without the knowledge of his Cabinet) Pres. Teddy Roosevelt dispatched sixteen battleships around the world. Remarked a reporter about the famous Roughrider, "You see him, hear him, talk to him, and then go home and wring the personality out of your clothes." Mr. and Mrs. Charles Glidden, on a round-the-world auto trip, boasted that their tires sometimes lasted 4000 miles.

Asks a reader in the December, 1907, JOURNAL: "Do well-bred girls nowadays whistle about the house, cross their legs, swing their arms in walking and smoke cigarettes?" Replies Mrs. Burton Kingsland, manners expert, in horror, "These things should be forbidden by law!"

Helpful hint: "Keep a grape basket at the top of the cellar stairs to fill with coal for the kitchen coal hod on each trip to the basement. Even the children can help."

"Most women will give up home sewing or expensive dressmakers when clothing manufacturers realize that what is wanted is not a profusion of trimmings but finer materials and well-made garments," predicts the fashion editor.

"Pretty Little Gifts for Christmas: What could be simpler to make than this dainty sewing apron? Almost everyone can do 'ladderwork' embroidery and buttonhole stitching and eyelets."

"How Children Are Made Drunkards: To give a baby a 'soothing syrup' is worse than murder," writes Dr. William Lee Howard. "The principal ingredient, with few exceptions, is some form of opium, laudanum or morphine."

"What To Do After Christmas Dinner: Why not play hunt-the-thimble? That will give you good exercise; or let someone hide a bagful of peanuts upstairs and down."

"Should not a married woman who is going to a doctor's office for treatment be accompanied by her husband or a woman friend?" asks a reader. Answer: "Yes, physicians prefer it."

The new winter furs: "Caracal, chinchilla, moleskin, astrakan, and black lynx."

"From 12 to 14 yards of material will make a pretty summer cotton frock costing in material about three dollars."

FROM "NORWAY. PAINTINGS FROM THE STAVE CHURCHES"—UNESCO WORLD ART SERIES

From a mural in one of Norway's ancient wooden churches comes this magnificent Nativity.

UNESCO has just been letting the Workshop look through the eight big breath-taking albums they have so far sponsored of some of the most wonderful and out-of-the-way art in the world. And with our breath back again we wish that as a Christmas present to its patrons every public library in the land could put these magnificent books on exhibition for your own delight and enlightenment. Not more masterpieces from museums, but instead rarely seen masterpieces incomparably reproduced in color from walls of caves in India, painted by Buddhist monks before and during the early Christian era; murals from medieval monasteries in the mountains of Yugoslavia; bark paintings by Australian aborigines; the finest of Persian miniatures, hitherto unknown to the public; paintings from Egyptian temples and tombs, from Spain of the Middle Ages, and recently discovered mural paintings from Norway's far-off ancient wooden churches—of which the Nativity above is one. And my! how ageless and glowing so many of all these paintings appear as you turn the pages.

The present eight albums are only a beginning. Keep asking about them at your library. The beauty of it is that although the albums cost $16.50 apiece, little enough for what you get, you can buy any one of the marvelous reproductions in color for only $2 each. About as fine a compliment to the recipient's taste as a Christmas present can be.

We asked Audrey to find the most enchanting toys in town and then to take the most enchanting child she could find to see them. The toys turned out to be at Schwartz's, a Fifth Avenue landmark across from Bergdorf's and just above Tiffany's, some irresistible animals from Giengen on the Brenz in Germany, with coats of mohairs and plushes, and in sizes from baby black Persian lambs to mother kangaroos complete with little kangaroos in their pouches on up to giraffes as high as 8½′ and $250. "More adorable than real ones, with none of the disadvantages," reported Audrey, who had chosen to take Nora O'Leary's three-year-old Nancy to see them. We asked what Nancy had to say. "Just like the animals—not a single word," said Audrey. "But if I hadn't had to take her home, I think the president of Schwartz's would have given her the store."

This life-size toy giraffe has Nancy O'Leary speechless.

ABBOT MILLS

The animal man reminded Audrey that it was this old family firm in Giengen on the Brenz which achieved world-wide fame overnight fifty years ago because at the White House banquet after the wedding of Alice Roosevelt and Nicholas Longworth, the caterer had used little plush bears as favors for the guests. "What breed of bears are those?" someone asked President Theodore Roosevelt's vivacious daughter. "You might call them Teddy bears," laughed Alice, looking up at her big-game-hunting father. And for five years after, Giengen on the Brenz was the busiest little town in Germany.

ABBOT MILLS

Verginia Robinson and Chase-Manhattan's $100,000.

"You have more to do with money than anyone around here," we told Verginia Robinson, who along with everything else keeps the editors in funds, "so why don't you go downstairs to the Chase-Manhattan and see if it's really true what the Federal Reserve people keep telling us each Christmas: that money is the most popular present of all, to give or receive?" . . . Here's her report: "They took me down to the vault and put me in a cage with $100,000 in ones and fives, fresh from the Bureau of Engraving. That was nothing. In the next cage there was $22,000,000. The teller told me that was nothing. New Yorkers spend up to $225,000,000 a week at Christmastime, $100,000,000 more than average. Banks hate new bills. Stick together—hard to count. Teller said let's see how much you can hold in dollar bills. Now I know: $14,000. A bigger woman might do better. Came back with the same 98 cents I went with."

THE STORY OF HOLLY AND IVY

By RUMER GODDEN

Christmas isn't Christmas without a tree, a star, a doll— and a little girl.

This is a story about wishing. It is also about a doll and a little girl. It begins with the doll. Her name, of course, was Holly.

It could not have been anything else, for she was dressed for Christmas in a red dress and red shoes, though her petticoat and socks were green. She was ten inches high and carefully jointed; she had real gold hair, brown glass eyes and teeth like tiny china pearls.

It was the morning of Christmas Eve, the last day before Christmas. The toys in Mr. Blossom's toyshop in the little country town stirred and shook themselves after the long night. "We must be sold today," they said.

"Today?" asked Holly. She had been unpacked only the day before and was the newest toy in the shop.

Outside in the street it was snowing, but the toyshop window was lit and warm—it had been lit all night. The tops showed their glinting colors, the balls their bands of red and yellow and blue; the trains were ready to run round and round. There were steamboats and electric boats; the sailing boats shook out their fresh white sails. The clockwork toys had each its private key; the tea sets gleamed in their boxes. There were airplanes, trumpets and doll perambulators; the rocking horses looked as if they were prancing and the Teddy bears held up their furry arms. There was every kind of stuffed animal: rabbits and lions and tigers, dogs and cats, even turtles with real shells. The dolls were on a long glass shelf decorated with tinsel, baby dolls, and bride dolls with bridesmaids in every color, a boy doll in a kilt and another who was a sailor. One girl doll was holding her gloves, another had an umbrella. They were all beautiful, but none of them had been sold.

"We must be sold today," said the dolls.

"Today," said Holly.

Like the Teddy bears, the dolls held out their arms. Toys, of course, think the opposite way to you. "We shall have a little boy or girl for Christmas," said the toys.

"Will I?" asked Holly.

"We shall have homes."

"Will I?" asked Holly.

The toys knew what homes were like from the broken dolls who came to the shop to be mended. "There are warm fires and lights," said the dolls. "Rooms filled with lovely things. We feel children's hands."

"Bah! Children's hands are rough," said the big toy owl who sat on a pretending branch below the dolls. "They are rough. They can squeeze."

"I want to be squeezed," said a little elephant.

"We have never felt a child's hands," said two baby hippopotamuses. They were made of gray velvet and their pink velvet mouths were open and as wide as the rest of them. Their names were Mallow and Wallow. "We have never felt a child's hands."

Neither, of course, had Holly.

The owl's name was Abracadabra. He was so big and important that he thought the toyshop belonged to him.

"I thought it belonged to Mr. Blossom," said Holly.

"Hsst! T-whoo!" said Abracadabra, which was his way of being cross. "Does a new little doll dare to speak?"

"Be careful. Be careful," the dolls warned Holly.

Abracadabra had wide-spread wings marked with yellow and brown, a big hooked beak and white felt feet like claws. Above his eyes were two fierce black tufts and the eyes themselves were so big and green that they made green shadows on his round white cheeks. His eyes saw everything, even at night. Even the biggest dolls were afraid of Abracadabra.

Holly's place on the glass shelf was quite close to Abracadabra. He gave her a look with his green eyes.

"This is the last day for shopping," said Abracadabra. "Tomorrow the shop will be shut."

A shiver went round all the dolls, but Holly knew Abracadabra was talking to her.

"But the fathers and mothers will come today," said the little elephant. He was called Crumple because his skin did not fit but hung in comfortable folds round his neck and his knees. He had a scarlet flannel saddle hung with bells, and his trunk, his mouth and his tail all turned up, which gave him a cheerful expression. It was easy for Crumple to be cheerful; on his saddle was a ticket marked "Sold." He had only to be made into a parcel.

"Will I be a parcel?" asked Holly.

"I am sure you will," said Crumple, and he waved his trunk at her and told the dolls, "You will be put into Christmas stockings."

"Oooh!" said the dolls longingly.

"But you won't all be sold," said Abracadabra, and Holly knew he was talking to her.

The sound of a key in the lock was heard. It was Mr. Blossom come to open the shop. Peter, the shopboy, was close behind him. There could be no more talking, but, "We can wish. We must wish," whispered the dolls and Holly whispered, "I am wishing."

"Hoo! Hoo!" went Abracadabra. It did not matter if Peter and Mr. Blossom heard him; it was his toy-owl sound, "Hoo! Hoo!" They did not know, but the toys all knew that it was Abracadabra's way of laughing.

The toys thought that all children have homes, but not all children have.

Far away in the city was a big house called St. Agnes' where thirty boys and girls had to live together but now, for three days, they were saying good-by to St. Agnes'. "A kind lady—or gentleman—has asked for you for Christmas," Miss Shepherd, who looked after them all, had told them and one by one the children were called for or taken to the train. Soon there would be no one left in the big house but Miss Shepherd and Ivy. CONTINUED ON PAGE 156

The Sugar House

Mark was dangerous, said her mother . . .
but Teresa knew that she would be safe with him all her life.

By ELIZABETH CADELL

The man who stood before the house had the air that men wear when they wait for a woman: a look half irritable, half resigned. A chauffeur came out of the house carrying two large suitcases, and put them in the luggage compartment of the waiting car. Following him came a maid, over her arm her mistress' fur coat, in her hand a smaller case. Round the house came the daily woman with Lady Thurloe's silver-gray poodle in her arms. This momentary bustle over, there was a pause, all was in readiness.

A girl came out presently; the man greeted her with a touch of impatience. "Your mother's cutting it rather fine, Teresa. Any hitch?"

"No: no hitch," she said. "She's ready."

He looked down at her for some moments, studying her. He was a tall, powerfully built man in his early thirties, dark, good-looking, his manner serious and perhaps a little heavy. He had been engaged to Teresa for the past month; they were to marry three months from now—in September. Staring down at her now, he thought she looked tired; she had probably stayed up late doing odd jobs for her mother.

The setting had a theatricality all its own. In the background rose the Sussex downs, gray-green in the early June sun, black in the shadows. In the foreground was the long, low house, pink-washed, as pretty as a post card, its lawns satin-smooth, its flower beds immaculate. Neville Morley, staring at it, decided it was all a bit too good to be true. It was far too Home-and-Garden. But he acknowledged that it was a perfect setting for Lady Thurloe's grace and charm.

"What are you smiling at?" Teresa asked him.

"This." He waved a hand. "I always feel—when your mother's around—like a film extra getting five guineas for hanging about in the background."

"She's coming—she won't be a minute," said Teresa.

"Sure you won't change your mind and come up to town with me?" he asked. "You can stay in my sister's flat while I'm over in Brussels. The business will take me only three days—then when I get back we can see a few shows and ——"

She shook her head. "No. There's something I want to do today."

"What sort of something?"

"I'll tell you when mother's gone."

Standing beside Neville, Teresa felt his impatience and slipped her hand into his. He looked down at her, and for a moment saw only her grace and loveliness, her delicate, maddeningly remote beauty. From the first moment of meeting, four years ago, she had had this quality of elusiveness. But she was going to be his; his ring was on her finger. When they were married, she would lose her shyness. She was almost twenty-four—and utterly unawakened. Sometimes, in moods of rare depression, he wondered whether she would ever melt in warm, glowing passion.

"Here she is," said Teresa.

"And about time," said Neville, and went forward to meet the woman who stood poised at the top of the steps.

Coralie Thurloe was tall and slender, and had retained much of the beauty of her youth. Her air was quiet, reposeful and prettily dignified: beautifully dressed, her whole appearance was that of a woman of means but also a woman of impeccable taste. She came slowly, gracefully down the steps and paused to pet the poodle, to talk to the gardener, to say a word of farewell to the maid.

Neville, watching her, saw the magic working and once again marveled. He had known her for over four years, and he had never seen it fail. A shrewd, even a cynical man, he had looked at first for flaws—and had found none. As time went on, a conviction had arisen in him that nobody could hold a pose—if it was a pose—so long and so untiringly. If it had been merely a performance, there would surely, he thought, have been times when she would have needed to relax. But she had remained what he was forced to call her own charming self: sweet, sympathetic and unselfish.

The real test, in Neville's eyes, had come when he expressed his wish to marry Teresa. Lady Thurloe had been for the past twenty years a widow; Teresa was her only child. But far from opposing or delaying the marriage, Lady Thurloe had expressed her delight and had even advised an early wedding. It was Teresa who had raised difficulties; her mother had swept them away. It had been almost the last time that Neville had questioned her sincerity—and the first time that he understood fully Teresa's affection for her

There's something about them

WILHELA CUSHMAN

Mrs. Kennedy (right), whose life revolves flexibly around her husband's plans, thinks of clothes in the simplest possible terms, never lets them become a problem. She shops with a thought-out purpose ("I don't like to buy a lot and have my closets full"), selects only a few new things each season, counting on last year's to carry over.

"A suit, a good little black dress with sleeves and a short evening dress—that's all you need for travel," Mrs. Kennedy says, thinking of the many times she flies off with her husband at a moment's notice. To these, for life in Washington she adds at least one evening dress each winter, plain jerseys or wools and a casual coat for country wear.

She loves red, especially in a basic tweed suit or evening dress, wears pink, clear yellows, pale green, thinks black can't be overestimated. She does not like "doodads," but likes to keep her good accessories "forever." Mrs. Kennedy is interested in houses, furniture, likes to draw, paint and write—when and if she can find the time.

Mrs. Canfield (left), intensely feminine, has very positive ideas about clothes. "I put all into one thing rather than many—then I wear, wear, wear it." She has as many colors in her wardrobe as an English flower garden because they look so well in London and they "cheer you up." She likes bright scarlet reds, sapphire blues, purple tweeds, but also the pastels—pale mauve, Du Barry pink, bright yellow, madonna blues and flower prints (both in her wardrobe and on her walls).

The coat she likes best is black, slim and sophisticated. She wears it constantly with one or two little black dresses and everything else, and plans to go on wearing it for years. In silhouette, she prefers "terribly simple" clothes, interesting bags and shoes, and pretty jewelry. She loves to entertain, adores decoration and anything to do with her house.

Mrs. Canfield photographed in a distinguished white faille evening dress with a crystal-embroidered blue satin bodice, bow-knots catching the fullness of the skirt; she wears matching long blue satin gloves.

Two sisters, young and beautiful, active in the brilliant life of two of the world's great capitals . . . Mrs. John F. Kennedy, wife of the senator from Massachusetts, and Mrs. Michael T. Canfield, whose husband was Special Assistant to former Ambassador Aldrich in London. They were the Misses Jacqueline and Lee Bouvier, of Washington, D. C.

JOHN ENGSTEAD

Mrs. Kennedy loves beautiful lines and the covered-up look for evening. This red slipper satin with the graceful wing-back silhouette is a romantic portrait fashion of great elegance which she likes utterly unadorned or with a single favorite piece of jewelry. For contrast, she wears gleaming white satin slippers.

There's something about them

This slim, simple polka-dot satin is pretty and useful for small dinners and entertaining at home, worn with pearls.

Mrs. Kennedy wears a short tweed coat worn with a dark or bright jersey dress or suit skirt for driving, and for busy days in and around Georgetown.

Mrs. Canfield loves a suit that is "young and easy to wear." This is her favorite violet tweed, worn with a black pin-seal chain bag.

Mrs. Canfield says this cheviot-tweed sheath coat is "everything I want a black coat to be."

Her glamorous short white evening dress is gold-and-white brocade, worn in almost any season in London.

Daughters

BURT GLINN

In strict theory, a good Moslem woman goes outdoors only twice in her life: when she marries and when she dies. But political ferment has brought women into the open—often veiled, but even the veils are disappearing.

Today in the big cities of Morocco the flocks of teen-age girls, their faces shining and unhidden, have become a familiar sight as they giggle their way to and from their new schools. To those who wish to retain the thirteen-hundred-year-old tradition of the seclusion of Mohammedan women, they are a slap in the face of the Prophet. To those who long for the emancipation of Moroccan women they represent hope, for they are the first generation to "emerge" in large numbers.

Apparently unaware of their own significance, they trot happily through the streets, the sun warm on their bare arms and legs, their swinging skirts and trim blouses. But over her heart, tucked in the pocket of her blouse, each girl follows the fashion—she wears a picture of the king's daughter, Princess Lalla Aisha.

"I would die for Lalla Aisha!" exclaimed one schoolgirl. "She has led us to freedom!"

In a blue mosaic gallery of her palace up on one of the hills of Rabat, the princess herself curled on a pink-and-blue damask couch, sipped sweet mint tea from a Venetian-glass tumbler, watched a stork flap above the fountain in the garden—and talked of freedom. She seemed weary, a little discouraged.

"Centuries and centuries of old families, old thinking. Of course there is much to be proud of in such a heritage. But if we are to become a modern nation we must break out of the old molds. Through evolution, not revolution—for revolution destroys, and we want to build. But it must be the young people who start the evolution. We have so many old ideas here in Morocco. So old. You can't imagine."

So old and so strong that the princess herself—a Joan of Arc to millions of Moroccan women—is still, in America's eyes, only halfway to freedom. With the encouragement of her father, the progressive King Mohammed V, she appears in public unveiled, wears Western clothes, drives a car. But she cannot attend a party in Morocco at which single young men are present, and at twenty-seven she is still unmarried. She can go dancing in France or America, but never in her own country. She can open bazaars, preside at charity events—but her eyes should be downcast and she should never look a strange man directly in the face.

Her friends sometimes describe her as "a bird in a gilded cage." Then they sigh. "Poor thing," they say; "she would only like to be a free and normal woman—and she cannot."

Malika, Hassan and Aisha usually were too busy riding tricycles through marble halls to pose for photographs. But they heeded sultan's orders.

The sultan is said to own sixty palaces and villas. This one, in Casablanca, is typical of all of them.

The Arabic name for Morocco is Moghreb-el-Aksa, "The Farthest West." Lying on the northwest shoulder of Africa, Morocco is the western remnant of the great Shereefian Empire founded twelve centuries ago by the Arabs. It is also the westernmost of the Islamic countries where, in a great arc stretching across North Africa, the Middle East and down into Pakistan, Allah is worshiped and Mohammed is his Prophet, women are said to have no souls and heaven is reserved for men and beautiful virgins.

In all these countries women have for centuries been regarded as the chattels of n, and kept in varying degrees of seclu-

n. Some of these nations are now more
'olved" than others: the veil was aboled in Turkey in the '20's and in Pakistan men have "come out" in great numbers he last ten years. In most of the other ntries only the aristocratic or uppers women have dared to emerge from harems and the zenanas; in a few nas like Yemen and Afghanistan a woman
s death if she appears on a city street eiled. A rough estimate, based on a l Moslem world population of 416,-
,000, would put 156,000,000 women behind veils.

What is the justification for this virtual risonment? "Custom, nothing but cus-dating from the times when a woman a man's personal possession," say the ncipated women of Islam. "The words he Prophet!" thunder the men.

he words of the Prophet, which have n a subject of serious debate since they e recorded shortly after his death in 632, are these:

And say to the believing women that cast down their looks and guard their ate parts, and display not their ornants, except those which are outside; and them pull their kerchiefs over their oms and not display their ornaments to their husbands and fathers. . . .

Oh ye women of the prophet! Stay still our houses and show not yourselves. . . .

Oh thou prophet! Tell thy wives and daughters, and the women of the evers, to let down over them their outer ppers. . . .

Men stand superior to women in that l hath preferred some of them over
rs. . . ."

s if this were not enough, Moslem osophers have been saying the same gs ever since. "As regards propriety," ared one famous writer, "one cannot be too careful not to let one's wife look at or be looked at by a stranger, for the beginning of all mischief is in the eye. As far as possible she should not be allowed out of the house, nor to go on the roof, nor to stand at the door. . . .

"If a man's wife be rebellious and disobedient, he should at first admonish her gently; if this is not sufficient he should sleep in a separate chamber for three nights. Should this also fail he may strike her, but not on the mouth, nor with such force as to wound her. . . .

"The Prophet said, 'If it were right to worship anyone except God, it would be right for wives to worship their husbands.'"

Down through the centuries these ideas prevailed—perhaps even more deeply in Morocco, where the religious feeling is strong. France, which took over the strategic Atlantic-Mediterranean country in 1912, made no attempt to change the basic culture, the old traditions. The crowded bazaars, the inward-turned homes of the Moroccans, the narrow alleys filled with African life and mystery were left as they had always been. Outside the ancient yellow walls of the native towns the French built shimmering white cities and self-absorbed societies of their own.

Today in Rabat, the capital of Morocco, this dual culture is evident. The ancient part of the city—once a nest for the dreaded Barbary pirates—clusters around its towering mosques out near the sea ramparts. The French part of the city stretches over the hills, neat with white stucco houses and trim parks glowing with pink oleanders and scarlet bougainvillaea. Modern traffic roars along wide, palm-bordered boulevards, dance bands play on the terraces of towering hotels. In the ancient city, women go heavily wrapped and veiled in the streets, and outdoors a child can

At two and three Aisha and Hassan loved to dress up in their Moroccan clothes and visit with the grownups gathered in the big drawing room downstairs. "Aisha must be silent, Hassan must talk," said their father, the sultan.

Let us Rejoice

When the poet and painter, William Blake, was old, poor and sick, he said to a little girl, "May God give you, my child, as wonderful a life as He has given me."

Few would call the facts of Blake's life wonderful. He was neglected as an artist, reviled by critics, betrayed by those he thought were friends; he experienced long periods of acute depression; he died, at the age of seventy, in poverty and almost unknown. Still, his was not an unhappy life. He produced much; he did have true friends; his beloved wife survived him a few years—biographers say she was the "almost perfect wife" for him. And no one now denies he was one of the greatest English poets. He had the power

To see a world in a grain of sand,
And a heaven in a wild flower,
Hold infinity in the palm of his hand,
And eternity in an hour.

For a touch of this power we pray this Christmas season, for a new awareness of the wonder and beauty of life. May we be truly grateful for its splendors! When we celebrate the divine gift of life to the Son of God, let us be thankful for our share in that gift, for those who give, and for the strength to give of ourselves. For we see by His example that those who give the most have yet the most to give. Death cannot defeat love that ranks the effort above the prize.

We are grateful, of course, for the dear and human life closest to us: children with faces as bright as the tinseled tree; a husband, a wife; and friends whose every gesture reveals the affection they pretend to have concealed in beribboned packages. We are grateful for the love they show us daily in open and secret ways.

We rejoice to say we believe the circle of human love—man for woman, child for parent, neighbor for neighbor—is widening. Man is not suddenly perfect in an imperfect world. But surely our generation, more than any other, has witnessed the realization in many hearts that love is not limited to one's family, one's race, one creed or one country. The famished untouchable of India is as much a part of us as the orphan in the next block. We are beginning to understand Jesus' words: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

If we were to have but one gift this Christmas Day, we would want it to be the gift of being humbly grateful for those who by selfless trying break through to new human achievements. If, as William Blake believed, this is God's world, they help to make it so,

For Mercy has a human heart,
Pity a human face,
And Love, the human form divine,
And Peace, the human dress.

Every life is shaped by persons, most of them unknown to the world. Others many know, but seldom do we express our appreciation, even to those closest to us. This year let us resolve to do so. Let us make a list of those we cherish, near and far, and tell them so. People we count among our blessings: ALBERT SCHWEITZER, for his reminding us again that one of the noblest of human capacities is unselfish service; PABLO CASALS and LEONARD BERNSTEIN; FREDERICK LOEWE and ALAN JAY LERNER, who transformed George Bernard Shaw's scintillating drama into the polished exuberance of My Fair Lady; ISAK DINESEN, weaver of fantastic and ponderable tales; RACHEL CARSON, who loves and reveals the wonders of the sea; GEORGE KENNAN, humanizing history with scholarship and perception in Russia Leaves the War; OSCAR WILLIAMS, whose gifted collection, Silver Treasury of Light Verse, can be read aloud with delight; EUGENE and AGNES MEYER, representing all those whose high publishing standards have served truth well; WHITNEY GRISWOLD, president of Yale and man of verve, who believes education should bring light to the spirit as well as tools to hand and brain; the antic and serious JAMES THURBER; EDWARD HOPPER and ANDREW WYETH, whose painting makes art perceptible.

This is a personal list, small but of large enthusiasms. Write your own and rejoice in it. Join us in gratitude for those in public life who remember their duty to all and not just to their political party; for those ministers who serve faithfully; for teachers who with generous unselfishness pass on the torch of knowledge; for mothers whose devoted efforts make children grow strong and healthy in body and spirit; for all workers who build and cherish well. To these we speak our thanks.

We speak, and we pray, and we are happy that we can speak out and pray aloud. Joyously we stretch wide our arms, lift up our eyes, thankful for "the starry heavens at night and the sentiment of duty in the human soul." And we are thankful that we are here, that we are alive, that we are a part of humanity's strange, varied, aspiring, stumbling, loving, magnificent procession.

BRUCE AND BEATRICE GOULD

Can this Marriage be Saved?

Looking back over some 30,000 unhappy marriages with which we have dealt in the American Institute of Family Relations, it is interesting to remember how many of them had been worsened by a "Christmas party at the office." Mother and the children were waiting on Christmas Eve for daddy to come home and help decorate the tree. They expected him early, they delayed the evening meal until it was ruined, they sat around tearfully until the children finally gave up and went off to bed. Sometime after midnight, perhaps, daddy came home drunk, with lipstick smeared over his collar, and tumbled into bed himself with a few mumbled apologies. Sometimes he did not show up until the next day. Such an episode might have been the final blow that killed the marriage. Fortunately, these "office parties" are less common each year, as one organization after another abandons them and proclaims its acceptance of the fact that holidays are particularly the time for families to be together. . . . The counselor in this case was E. Groobin.

PAUL POPENOE, SC.D.,
General Director

DON ORNITZ

SHE: "Josh declared it was his duty as a bank official to appear at the office party. I lowered my pride, a hard thing for me, and asked him to stay away to demonstrate his loyalty. He refused."

HE: "It shouldn't be hard for Elsa to understand I was obliged to attend the party. I'll admit I didn't distinguish myself, but she has been paying me off for weeks in dozens of oblique, left-handed ways."

ELSA TELLS HER SIDE: "My husband's office party ruined our Christmas," said Elsa, a pale, appealing young woman of twenty-seven. It was the sixth of January and she was clad in a well-worn coat. "Everybody knows the Christmas season is supposed to be devoted to the family and building up family traditions. My mother died when I was nine years old and my sweetest memories are of the two of us going out together in the Nebraska snow to find and cut our tree.

"Josh's office party—he works for a world-famous bank—was staged on the twenty-third of December. On that particular day I was frantically busy and needed his assistance with our own holiday preparations. In the morning I made cookies and candies for our three youngsters. I let the two girls help, which doubled the work. I trimmed our foyer and refurbished last year's wreath and nailed it to our front door. That afternoon I went to the market and picked out our tree. I lugged it home on the bus by myself.

"When Josh arrived that evening he barely glanced at the tree. The girls tried to show off the cookies they had baked and he snapped at them. He was in such wild haste to bathe and dress he hardly spoke to any of us. While the children and I ate a supper of frankfurters and beans he put on his best suit, changed his necktie three times before he was satisfied with the effect, stuck a flower in his buttonhole and then went off in a cloud of dust to attend his fancy office party. He banged the door as he went.

"Josh and I haven't an extra penny to spend on recreation and entertainment for ourselves. No expense was spared to make the office party a bang-up success. It was held at a country club that I have yet to enter. Only wealthy people belong. An orchestra was hired. There were favors for the girls. A wonderful dinner, including cocktails and imported champagne, was served. I haven't tasted champagne since Josh and I were married eight years ago. At our wedding we had one bottle of domestic champagne for six people.

"Back in November when I first heard the bank was throwing a party I was thrilled and excited. Until quite recently we lived in a small town and perhaps I have small-town ideas. Anyhow, I assumed since I was Josh's wife I would be welcome at the party. I knew we couldn't afford a new dress for me. I scrimped on our food and bought a new fake-fur stole and made over my old dress. It wasn't until I modeled the dress for Josh that I learned how I had wasted my time. He hemmed and hawed, but finally blurted out that the party was limited to bank employees. Wives and husbands weren't invited. It seems the employees had got together and decided they would have a jollier time by themselves. Josh insisted he and most of the other men had voted in favor of inviting their wives, which may be possible. The married women at the bank, he said, had voted against inviting their husbands. That should give you some idea of the nature of the party.

"Josh declared it was his duty as a bank official to appear. Three months ago he became an assistant cashier, but I don't consider him a real official since he got the title instead of getting a richly deserved raise. At any rate, I thought a truly loving husband wouldn't choose to mingle socially with a lot of man-crazy young subordinates. Josh supervises a group of twenty teen-agers who specialize in tight sweaters and plunging necklines. The bleached-blond siren whose desk is beside his desk—her name is Marilyn and she is fluttering around Josh every time I stop in at the bank—spends her entire salary on clothes and in beauty shops. I can't compete with her. Frankly, I didn't care to share Josh's company with Marilyn in the evening as well as in the daytime. I lowered my pride,

It was half past twelve before Josh came weaving in. His face was plastered with lipstick; there was lipstick on his collar; there was lipstick on his hair.

What makes the Stars Shine?

"MY HAIR IS FINE AND WISPY," says CLAIRE BLOOM, talented English actress. "By making a point of knowing what it won't do, I have a better chance of making the most of what it will do. For instance, no matter how carefully permanented, my hair just frizzes at the ends and looks impossible. So instead of wishfully thinking about the luxury of a softly turned permanent, I count on having to put up the ends in pin curls about an hour before I want it to look its best. For the hairdo I'm wearing in my photograph, I start two rows of curls from the center part, wind them forward around my finger toward my face, and fasten them with hairdresser's clips—one clip for each curl. For the lift at the forehead and near the temples, I stand the curls on the sides when I pin them, rather than flatten them against my head. Because my hair is so fine, I put the ends up without wetting them, otherwise I'd have that frizz.

"Since I'm not blessed with naturally well-behaved hair, I count on cleanliness—a shiny, glistening look—as its major asset. I wash it twice a week, rinse with clear water, follow with a creamy rinse, towel it dry and then put it up. In emergencies, when I haven't the hour to spare for curling, I comb and brush my hair straight back, twist and pin the ends in a flat little bun, and attach a separate chignon to that. The effect is smooth and sophisticated, and I doubt that anyone recognizes it as an emergency

When is Love Wrong?

One day, not so long ago, the JOURNAL editors received an unusual letter in the mail. "In approximately two weeks," we read, "I will become an unmarried mother having to give up for adoption a child I want very much to keep. . . .

"If the truth about such a situation could be published, provided names and places were changed, perhaps at least one girl, who is not fast or cynical, yet, who might someday find herself in the same mess because she loved and believed in someone, could see before it was too late what could really happen, and what nightmares she would have to live with the rest of her life."

The story, when it came in, aroused a storm of controversy among those who read it. We publish it here together with some of our editors' comments.

In a little apartment on a quiet residential street, a young woman curled on a couch and talked. Her blue eyes sometimes dimmed with tears, but her pink cheeks and her auburn hair shone with health and the love of outdoors. Everything about her suggested wholesomeness, normality and a gentle background. Yet the day before she had given up forever the newborn baby she felt she could not keep. She wears a wedding ring, but she is unmarried.

"I held my baby for five minutes. That's all I could stand—I knew if I held her for one minute more, I'd never be able to give her away. My, she was pretty! Even the social worker at the hospital said mine was one of the prettiest babies she ever saw. And she was smart too! Do you know, on the very second day of her life, she could follow things with her eyes? And she was laughing, really she was.

"Right up to the very end, I would have walked out of the hospital with her, if only Jim had agreed to marry me. I could go back home with a baby born before I was married, but I couldn't go back unless I was married, I just couldn't. It would be too awful for my folks. They'd die, they'd just die if they knew about all this. Of course they'd forgive me and take me in, but it would be terrible for them. We just don't do this sort of thing in our family!

"I guess we're what you might call lower middle class. My dad's a railroad superintendent in a city about a hundred miles from here. They have a nice enough house, and they live just about like other people, I guess. I have a sister three years older than I am, and I always thought my parents wanted me to be a boy, or that my mother didn't want a second child.

"I didn't get along very well with my mother—I was always a little afraid of her. She was strict, she was the disciplinarian in the family. Somehow pop didn't seem to have much to do with my childhood. Mother's bright, too, and she always seemed to expect more of me than I was capable of giving. She used to make me dance and sing in front of company, and when I was around five or six she used to say to me, 'Your sister learned to read when she was four. So what's the matter with you?' My mother always said I was a lot like pop's mother. She hated pop's mother.

"She never talked to me about sex or love or morals or anything. I found out about sex when I was twelve, and found a book about it under my sister's bed one day when I was cleaning house. I read all I could and put the book back—but could never find that book again. When I was fifteen and going off to camp my mother asked me whether I knew about periods and all that stuff, and I said yes, I'd learned from other girls, and that's all there was to it.

"We had sex instruction in school, but it was only about the physical part, not about morality or standards or anything like that. I went to Sunday school until I was fourteen, but it seems all they ever taught us was to collect money for missionaries. My parents hardly ever go to church—just Christmas and Easter, I guess.

"After we'd grown up, when my sister and I were sort of on our own, mother said she expected us to behave well—we were brought up well and ought to know what we were doing. But she never really explained what behaving well meant. I guess I should have known, anyway.

"There wasn't any problem about love or sex when I was in high school, because I didn't have any dates. I don't know why, exactly, but I wasn't at all popular. Well, for one thing, I wore braces on my teeth; and for another, I liked to read a lot—a real bookworm I was. I still am, just like Jim. The first night I was ever kissed was graduation night.

"When I got to college, it all changed. Maybe I was prettier or something, but I started going out a lot—even in a college where there were more girls than boys. It was just a small college you've never heard of, but it was all my parents could afford. I had a wonderful time, but if boys ever tried anything funny I just told them to stop, and that was usually enough. Once I got out of a car and walked home, because the boy was too fresh and I couldn't handle him.

"In college we used to talk about boys and sex, but never in any detail. We had something called the 'Turtle Club.' You were a black turtle if you had ever had intercourse, a white turtle if you hardly ever kissed boys, and a gray turtle if you petted sometimes. Nobody wanted to be black or white, so we all said we were gray turtles. I guess I was really a white turtle then—I always believed I'd stay pure until I fell in love with a good man and he with me. Then we'd get married and live in the suburbs and have lots of children and be just like everyone else. That's all I ever really wanted.

"After college I got a little job in a library in my home town, just helping out because I didn't have library training. And I started going around with a very nice fellow, just beginning as an architect. We had a lot of fun, but it never really got very serious. Finally we broke up.

"I felt sad, even though I wasn't in love with him. But you know how it is—it's lonely when you break up with someone and before you've found someone else. I guess I like boys better than girls, and I like to have them around. Well, anyway, I decided to go off for a weekend by myself at the seashore, and think things over. That was the weekend I met Jim. We were both staying at the same little hotel, and the lady who ran the place introduced us. On Friday night after I got back from a movie I went to with her, Jim and I sat up till two A.M., talking.

"Jim is a wonderful talker—he's read a lot, and he's interested in everything in the world. Except marriage, I guess. His father has a hardware store in a small town south of here, and it's been a struggle financially. Jim's mother died when he was twelve, and he had a stepmother after that. They get along all right, but sometimes I wonder if all that didn't affect him. Anyway, that night we seemed to have a lot in common. I was twenty-two then, and he was twenty-three.

"The next day we went sailing all day in a boat he'd rented. We sailed on Sunday, too, and then we walked along the beach for miles. That was the first day he Editors who saw this story before publication have strong—and widely different—feelings about it. Here are some of their comments. What do you think? Should she have given up her child?

"This breaks my heart, it's so sad. Poor, poor girl." J.L.M.

"This is a very pathetic story. But actually this girl could have kept her baby if she had really wanted to. Without hurting the baby either. She could have gone to another town, taken another name, lived as a young widow and kept her child. Even the strictest religion would agree, I believe, that a small deception of this sort is justified for the sake of the child. Probably in a few years she would have married. In most such cases, this is what happens. I think the real reason she gave up this child is that she would have had to face up to her family and tell them what she had done." M.G.

"I agree with the above. This girl cries out for sympathy—but the fact is she wasn't willing to accept the consequences of her own action." R.L.K.

"Don't agree. This girl loved and trusted. It was the man who was the real heel. He promised to marry her and didn't keep his word." G.M.

"All her faults were faults of love. She thought if she loved this man enough, and showed him that she did, he would want to marry her." N.M.

"It's a funny thing about love. You must give it and give it generously, and somehow yet not give yourself away." B.J.R.

"I think in love you must give a great deal—up to the point of doing wrong. Even in marriage you should never do wrong for the sake of the other person. You weaken him as well as yourself. This girl's action was wrong just for the reason premarital sex is wrong—in spite of many changed attitudes today: because it carries the possibility of damaging an unborn child." T.C.

"It seems to me this girl's actions also damaged the young man she loved. She encouraged his selfishness and weakness. He'll be a worse man all his life for this experience." E.M.C.

"Did she really give way to him because of love? Or was she trying to use her sex to bind to her a man she sensed didn't really want to marry her?" K.L.B.

"I'm told most social workers today advise girls in such a situation to give up their babies. It surely is the easiest way." L.M.J.

"I can imagine no greater torture than knowing you have a child somewhere you will never see." H.H.

Appleyard Open House

ARTHUR GRIFFIN—FPG

The party takes place all over the house. Storytelling in one room by the fire, taffy pulling and corn popping in the kitchen, fiddling and dancing in the hall. The skies are shining with their chill winter glitter, and snow sparkles reflect in all the rooms of the house.

An endless procession comes out of the pantry with loaded platters—a big ham glazed with maple syrup, a glowing hot casserole of scalloped oysters, crisp vegetables, a luscious bowl of spiced tomato marmalade!

By ELIZABETH KENT GAY

My mother, Mrs. Appleyard, is not only a fine cook herself; she has done her best with gentle pressure and delicate hints to turn her daughters into good cooks too. "I think you will find," she suggests one day around the middle of December, coming into the kitchen where I am assembling Florentine cookies for our annual holiday open house, "that it is easier to cut candied fruit with scissors than a knife." That's the kind of delicate hint I mean. I try the scissors and it is easier. In no time at all the kitchen has begun to fill with the heady holiday smell of baking fruits and spices.

It is traditional to ask all the guests to bring contributions of food to the open house—that way, no one person has all the work, and each one feels as if someone else is giving the party! You might think that having each person contribute something would result in all fruitcake and no salad, but some obscure physical principle—plus a few discreet telephone calls—operates to insure a delicious and balanced variety.

"I'm making spiced beef," mother confides; "it's already out of the pickle." Mother's spiced beef—rosy, sliced thin as a poinsettia petal, and tucked into tiny hot buttered baking-powder biscuits—is standard holiday equipment in our family; as appetizers for a holiday party, these are bound to disappear rapidly.

SPICED BEEF—Virginia Style:

Mother starts her spiced beef 5 days ahead of the party. She gets out a crock or large bowl that is not metal and will easily hold a 5-pound piece of round of beef. If the butcher rolls and ties the meat, it will slice beautifully after it is cooked. Mix together 1½ ounces saltpeter (Mrs. Appleyard buys hers from the drugstore) and 1½ cups salt. Rub a little of this all over the beef. Put the CONTINUED ON PAGE 123

All the guests bring something from their store of Christmas baking.
The ham reigns supreme on the long maple dining table, covered with an old-fashioned red-and-white cloth;
under the brown crust of the casserole there are succulent oysters;
slices of fruitcake and crisp Florentines join the candied applesauce, for dessert.

She heard the key turn on the other side of the door.

SCENT OF CLOVES

By NORAH LOFTS

CONCLUSION There followed some peaceful, ordinary days, during which Julia saw little of either Mynheer or Doctor Hootman. The latter's holiday was, Julia was given to understand, to combine a business errand, and in preparation for this the two men spent many hours in the library with books and papers spread before them.

Echo and Julia took over the duties which Doctor Hootman had relinquished. It was the first time that Julia had been in close contact with the huge, dumb Ethiopian, and her original feeling of pity for him gradually gave way to one of exasperation. He performed with clockwork regularity and precision all his actual duties, but he took no interest and never pretended to.

Doctor Hootman was to leave on a Thursday, in the morning. The Queen of the East sailed from Banda in the afternoon. The library that morning was deserted, the books and papers put away. In Pieter's room Echo sat with arms folded as usual, but Pieter was busily and happily employed applying some ready-mixed red paint in blobs and strokes to his collection of clay pots.

He rose, overturning the paintpot, and seized her hand. "Julie. Good morning. Look. Pretty."

"Very pretty."

Doctor Hootman came to the door that led into Pieter's bedroom, a shirt in his hand.

"Good morning, Mevrouw," he said. "I wanted to see you. I'm packing. Would you mind coming into Pieter's bedroom?"

"I'll come and paint with you in a moment," Julia said to Pieter. "Do one for me now. A pot for Julie. A pretty one."

Doctor Hootman's room lay beyond Pieter's and through the open doorway she could see his bed, with a little open valise on it. Doctor Hootman stood by the door that led into the garden.

"Mevrouw, I have a favor to ask of you. You and you alone can enable me to go away with any peace of mind."

"I'd do anything to contribute to that, Doctor Hootman. What do you want me to do?"

"Look after Pieter," he said with a peculiar urgency. "Echo is useless, worse than useless; he has a most undermining effect. Pieter holds out something and says 'Look' and he won't even move his eyes; to anyone like Pieter that is discouraging. It's as though he hit him."

"Oh, I will. I meant to anyway. I shall spend almost all my time with him."

"Thank you," he said. "It matters to me. Very much." His gaze slid away to the garden. "You see, I've devoted myself for eight long years to keeping a spark of something ——"

He broke off as Pieter came blundering into the bedroom, carrying a pot to which the paint had been so hastily applied that it was running off and dropping to the floor.

"Pretty. For Julie," he said, holding it out.

"You see? No control. No interest. Pieter, dirty! Dirty! Let it dry. Dirty Julie's dress. Dirty Julie's hands. Back on the table. To dry."

Slowly Pieter turned and ambled away.

"That is another thing, Mevrouw. I don't think this will happen—I hope not—but if he should on any account fall into a tantrum, don't let him throw himself about; and don't let Echo handle him roughly. Send for Mynheer." He brushed his hand over his forehead. "Really, I don't think I should have agreed to this. I should have refused."

"I think all this anxiety is really a sign that you need a holiday."

"I need a holiday. But there are many things I need more. I hope you can manage."

"I'm sure I can," she said.

That evening she and Mynheer dined alone for the first time. He remarked upon it, saying flatteringly that he preferred her company to all others', and having said that proceeded to talk as entertainingly as he had ever done at any party. Listening to him, fascinated, and now and again provoked to laughter, she took another step toward adulthood in the realization that it was possible to derive pleasure from the company of someone of whom one disapproved.

He ended a story concerning a native Bandanese, named Shal Ahmi, who had fooled everyone in the islands a few years earlier, and organized the only really successful slave revolt that had ever taken place; and then said, "Now tell me what you have been doing all day."

She had devoted her time to Pieter and somehow he had sensed—she thought—that he had been the center of extra attention. When she had left him he had clung to her and had lifted her hand and kissed it again and again, wet, slobbering kisses like a dog's, just saved from being distasteful by virtue of the otherwise inexpressible feeling which lay behind them.

"I do see," she said, when she had given a brief account of their activities that day, "that for purposes of concealment, Echo is perfect; but I don't suppose Pieter can understand that he can't talk to him, and Echo doesn't try. There's something flat and dead in the room when they're together. You can feel it when you go in."

"Yes; it is a pity. But anyone who could talk to Pieter could talk about him. Menials, I mean. And he must have an attendant."

After a moment's silence, he went on:

"You have become genuinely fond of my poor boy, have you not?"

"Oh, yes. He has some endearing ways, like a child, or a ——"

"Or what?"

Her face reddened. "I was about to say a dog. But not in any derogatory sense. I'm very fond of dogs. I always wanted one."

"My dear Julia! How many times have I told you to ask for anything, anything at all that you wanted? Why did you never ask?"

"I don't know. Well, for one thing I didn't know whether people did have dogs in the islands."

"Of course they do. What kind of dog would you like?"

"One of those small, long-eared spaniels," she said promptly. "Mevrouw Helmers, at the home, had one, so tiny she could carry it in her sleeve."

"You shall have one, as soon as possible. What a pity you didn't mention it sooner. Daan could have added it to his list of commissions. What shall you call it?"

"Charles."

"Oh. Yes, yes, of course. You know, Julia, your choice is very revealing."

Did he mean her choice of dog, or her choice of name?

Coloring again and avoiding his eyes, she asked, "In what way, Mynheer?"

"Women," said Mynheer in his smooth, conversational way, "can be divided into many different categories: plain or pretty; witty or dull; but the deepest division is between the maternal and the courtesan types; and what they like is the surest sign. The Christmas-red fruit punch decked with holly for holiday toasting.

"Christmas for children—Christmas for us"—the most openhearted season of the year. Part of its magic is the hours the family shares in wrapping packages and trimming the tree. But Christmas is odors, too—fragrant, spicy ones of cakes and cookies baking, blended with the cool, tangy smell of pine, hemlock and fir.

For our collection this year, we've chosen a festive and gala group of good recipes for holiday toasting and feasting.

First, for toasting—a vibrant hot apple toddy, a sparkling cranberry punch that says "cheers" by the very look of it, and a smooth and gentle orange eggnog. Add something spirited if you like.

HOT APPLE TODDY: In a saucepan, mix together 1 quart apple juice, ⅓ cup dark brown sugar and ½ lemon, sliced. Bring to a boil. Simmer for 5 minutes. Add several dashes aromatic bitters. Serve warm in teacups. Makes 6–8 servings.

CRANBERRY PUNCH: Peel the rind thinly from 6 oranges and 6 lemons. Steep in 1 quart boiling water 10 minutes. Strain. Boil 2 pounds sugar in 1 quart water for 10 minutes. Squeeze the juice from the 6 oranges and 6 lemons you have peeled and add the juice of 6 more lemons. Add 1 cup cranberry-juice cocktail and 1 can crushed pineapple. Combine the liquids and pineapple, remembering that 3 quarts soda water are to be added just before serving. Serve ice-cold. Makes 6 quarts.

ORANGE EGGNOG: Beat 6 egg yolks until foamy and add slowly 1 can frozen orange-juice concentrate, thawed, the juice of 1 lemon and ½ teaspoon nutmeg, then 5 cups milk. Beat the whites of the eggs stiff and add slowly ½ cup sugar. Fold the whites into the other mixture and serve with a ladle from a really generous punch bowl.

Do you remember the cooky bake we had for some of our JOURNAL children last year? This season we are going to have an old-fashioned taffy pull. We may not have a snowbank outside the door in which to cool the plates of taffy to just the right stage for pulling, but we'll have a sweet, buttery feast of:

OLD-FASHIONED MOLASSES TAFFY: Melt ½ cup butter. Mix 2 cups sugar, 1¼ cups molasses, 1½ cups water in a large kettle. Pour in melted butter. Cook over low heat and stir till sugar is dissolved. Then cook rapidly at first, lowering heat as the mixture thickens, to prevent burning. Cook to hard ball in cold-water stage, 258° F., and pour into 3 greased pie plates. As edges cool, turn toward center with spatula, or edges will be hard before center is ready to pull. When cool enough to handle, grease hands slightly and pull candy until light in color and too hard to pull further. Stretch out in twisted rope about ½" or so in diameter. Cut with scissors before the candy gets too hard.

No holiday season would be complete without making at least one steamed pudding. We've given you dozens through the years. This one is fragrant with pineapple and studded with dates.

STEAMED PINEAPPLE-DATE PUDDING: Sift together 1½ cups flour, ¾ teaspoon baking soda, 1 teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon each allspice, cloves and cinnamon. Combine 1 cup finely chopped pitted dates and 2 tablespoons shortening with ½ cup boiling water and ½ cup pineapple syrup. Beat 1 egg well. Add ½ cup sugar and ½ cup well-drained crushed pineapple, mixing until well blended. Add date mixture, then sifted dry ingredients. Mix until flour is well moistened. Pour into a well-greased 5-cup pudding mold. Cover with foil or double thickness of waxed paper. Steam 1 hour and 45 minutes. Remove from pan and allow pudding to cool a few minutes before unmolding. Serve warm with hard sauce. Serves 8.

Christmas cookies or a homemade confection gaily wrapped and beribboned always bears the warmest of greetings; we'd like to add to your collection of gifts to make these wonderful crisp filbert cookies, glazed fruit and orange-sugared walnuts.

FILBERT COOKIES: Beat 4 egg whites and a pinch of salt until very soft peaks form. Then add 1½ cups sugar gradually, 2 tablespoons at a time, beating well after each addition. Add 4 egg yolks, one at a time, beating well after each addition. Fold in ½ pound toasted and finely ground filberts, 2 tablespoons cinnamon and the grated rind of 1 lemon. Spoon out onto greased baking sheets several inches apart. Let stand, uncovered, overnight to dry. Bake in a slow oven, 325° F., for 6–8 minutes or until browned. They should be a light tan to gold color. Makes about 75 small cookies.

GLAZED FRUIT: Wash 1 pound dried apricots, cover with boiling water and let stand for 5 minutes. Drain and repeat. Then turn into a colander. Boil without stirring 2 cups sugar with 1 cup water and 1 tablespoon corn syrup to 275° F. by your candy thermometer. Put in about a dozen apricots at a time and simmer until the fruit seems rather transparent. Remove without disturbing the syrup unnecessarily. Drain on a wire cake rack. Repeat with the rest of the fruit. If the syrup becomes sugary, add a bit of boiling water. Roll fruit in confectioners' sugar and let dry on a tray. The same can be done with dried figs, peaches and prunes.

ORANGE-SUGARED WALNUTS: Boil 2 cups walnut halves 3 minutes. Toast lightly in a slow oven, 300° F. Mix 2 cups sugar, 10 tablespoons orange juice, the grated rind of 1 orange and ¼ teaspoon salt. Cook as a syrup to the soft-ball stage—or 238° F. if you use a thermometer. Stir around well and add the nuts. Stir slowly. Try not to break the nuts. At a certain point the syrup will begin to whiten and sugar off, as we say. Lift out the walnuts in their sugar coating with a fork, a piece at a time. Dry on waxed paper. Store in a tightly covered metal box.

Most of us cling to serving a traditional dessert for Christmas dinner itself, but like to come up with something different with a holiday touch when we entertain. Hot almond-flavored poached peaches decked with toasted almonds and served with an icy-cold raspberry-strawberry sauce are Christmasy looking and make a divine finale to almost any party menu you might plan. Equally good, if not so adaptable to all menus, is this hot mincemeat sauce for ice cream.

HOT PEACHES WITH FRUIT SAUCE: First, make the sauce: Partially thaw 1 package frozen raspberries and 1 package frozen strawberries. Break them up and buzz in the blender or purée until smooth. Add 2 tablespoons lemon juice and 1 cup Melba sauce (you buy this in a jar). If you like, you may add 2 tablespoons Cointreau. Makes about 1 pint. Chill. When ready to serve, heat large canned cling-peach halves in their own syrup with a little almond flavoring. Sprinkle with toasted, slivered almonds and serve hot with the cold sauce. If you have a chafing dish, you might heat the peaches at the table.

MINCEMEAT SAUCE FOR ICE CREAM: Mix together 1½ cups canned mincemeat and 6 tablespoons frozen pineapple-grapefruit-juice concentrate, thawed, straight from the can, ¼ cup water and 3 tablespoons brown sugar. Bring to a boil. Add ½ cup chopped walnuts. Serve hot over ice cream. Makes about 2½ cups.

Christmas Eve is filled with enchantment from the first moment when the candles are lit till the church bells ring in the towers. But it's a busy time for all the family. A light supper is called for—we like a hot baked soup, hot French bread, a bountiful fruit salad with an exciting sweet-sour dressing, Christmas cookies and cups and cups of hot, fragrant tea or coffee.

BAKED SOUP: Mix 1 quart can of a good brand of turtle soup with 2 cans cream-of-pea soup and set the mixture to warm. Peel 1 cucumber and slice it lengthwise. Discard the seeds and leave only the fleshy part. Cut into chunks and sauté in butter until transparent. Add to the soup. This much could be done earlier in the day. Add 2 tablespoons Parmesan cheese and, if you wish, 2 tablespoons sherry. Whip ½ pint heavy cream until stiff. Spoon the cream on top of the hot soup and set in the oven till the cream browns. Serve with crisp French bread.

FRUIT SALAD WITH SWEET-SOUR DRESSING: Use whatever fruits are available—grapefruit, oranges, apples, grapes. Cut these up in the afternoon, sprinkle with lemon juice, add a little finely chopped celery and a can of pitted white cherries.

For the dressing: Mix in a saucepan ¾ cup sugar, 1 teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon mustard, 1 teaspoon paprika, ½ teaspoon celery seed and ⅓ cup vinegar. Boil gently until sugar is dissolved. Remove from heat. Cool. Add 1 cup salad oil and 1 tablespoon onion juice or finely grated onion. Put in a covered jar and keep in refrigerator. It will keep for a month. Whip up with a fork before serving.

And now, may your kitchen be as busy as ours with the happy doings of making Christmas merry!

Keeping alert to innovations that can facilitate shipping is an important part of a traffic manager's job. Here, two industrial traffic managers get first-hand information about a recently developed system for shipping cargo-laden trucking company trailers by rail. Trailers return to the highway for delivery of their cargoes to final destinations.

Should your child be a Traffic Manager?

by GEORGE P. BAKER

Professor of Transportation, Harvard Business School, President, Transportation Association of America

(As told to DONALD ROBINSON)

WIDE-WINGED PLANES racing through the skies. Mighty trains roaring down the tracks. Powerful trucks dashing along the nation's highways. Hefty ships cutting through ocean waves and inland waters. Every moment of every day they are on the go, carrying goods from place to place.

Transportation is a huge, $100-billion-dollar-a-year industry in the United States today. And it is still growing. In 1939, American transportation men handled 543.5 billion ton-miles of freight. In 1956, the total was over 1,350 billion ton-miles. By 1960, the figure is expected to be 1,750 billions.

There is a key man in this dynamic field—the industrial traffic manager. He helps keep freight moving speedily, safely, punctually. He sees to it that raw materials reach the factories, that finished products arrive at the markets, that you and I get the things we need when we need them.

His is among the most interesting, constructive assignments in all industry. It is no accident that industrial traffic managers rarely switch careers.

Just look at the absorbing duties a traffic manager for an industrial concern has. The movement of all goods to and from his company's plants is under his personal direction. Should a shipment be sent by road, rail, water, air, or pipeline? It is his decision. Which route should be traveled? It is up to him. What carrier should be awarded the multi-thousand-dollar business? He says.

No simple task this. Not when you consider that, to do it well, a man must know every type of transportation service thoroughly, and be able to make his way through countless freight classifications, rates and routes, plus thousands of intricate local, state and federal transportation regulations.

The industrial traffic manager has lots of other stimulating functions, too. Real detective work like tracing lost shipments, for example. Processing damage claims. Auditing bills which can run into millions of dollars. Leasing port and terminal facilities for cargo. Handling insurance questions.

There's more: Many companies operate their own fleets of trucks, tanks and freight cars, barges, and even planes. Whether or not to do so is the traffic man's problem.

If he is qualified, the traffic manager may be called upon to appear at formal hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission, or other regulatory bodies, and argue his company's case in rate matters.

In addition, some traffic men are responsible for packaging, loading and warehousing. They have much to do with the selection of new plant sites, too.

As you can see, a traffic manager is a pivotal person in his company. He works closely with the production department to set shipping schedules that jibe with manufacturing programs. He sits in with the purchasing department to determine quantities that can be transported most economically. He cooperates with the sales department in the development of new marketing areas.

A good man can save his company a vast amount of money. Not long ago, a man I know of took over as traffic manager for a manufacturer of "assemble-it-yourself" furniture. He did some careful research into freight classifications and came up with a bright new idea.

"For years," he said to the owner of the company, "you have been shipping your nuts and bolts and your wooden parts in the same crates. Let's ship them separately from now on."

"Sounds crazy to me," his boss said. "Why?"

"Because they have different freight classifications. If we ship them separately, we can get the benefit of the lower rates on the nuts and bolts."

His plan was adopted. It is saving his firm $280,000.

Inasmuch as some industries spend almost forty percent of their sales income on outbound freight, you can e the significance of reduced transportation costs. And ıe importance of the traffic managers who achieve them.

I must admit that traffic managers have not always ood high in industry.

They did when they first came into existence. That was the early days of railroads, last century. There was no gulation of freight rates, and each concern had to ake its own bargains with the various railroads. It red a specialist to do the negotiating and a good one as worth his weight in gold.

However, after the passage of federal legislation in 87, regulating freight rates, it was widely felt that othing much was left for traffic managers to do. Their ature often dwindled to that of minor shipping clerks.

Now times have changed again. With the evolution of odern, competitive means of transportation—trucks, rplanes, barge lines—industry has come to realize ore and more that traffic management is a science hich it cannot afford to neglect.

Today, traffic managers enjoy considerable esteem d influence. More and more of them rank as vice esidents of their companies. They have sizable staffs der them and they are paid accordingly.

Lately, a survey was made of the salary scales among dustrial traffic managers. It was learned that many ding traffic managers receive salaries of around 0,000 a year. In the chemical and petroleum indus- es salaries of $25,000 to $30,000 are common.

Traffic managers count heavily outside of their own mpanies. In moments of crisis, the government in- riably turns to them for help. During World War II d the Korean War, many did yeoman service in ashington, transferring raw materials to war plants d getting munitions and troops to the battlefields.

know of one traffic manager who was awarded the partment of Defense Citation for Exceptional Civilian rvice in the Korean War.

Nor is that all. The views of traffic men are sought in te capitols and in Washington and they play a crucial e in setting government transportation policy. Their ws are often worked out in the National Industrial ffic League, a shipper association with high prin- les and fine traditions, and in the Transportation sociation of America which gets men from all forms transport and shippers and investors to sit down und a table and work out common problems of ional significance.

Traffic management has other advantages to the ng person seeking a career. The hours are regular. rking conditions are pleasant. You often travel far l wide. You usually have job security. Chances for motion are excellent.

Best of all, I can truthfully report that traffic manage- nt has graduated from the level of an occupation to prestige heights of a profession. Traffic men have a ndid code of ethics—adopted through the endeavors he American Society of Traffic and Transportation the transportation fraternity, Delta Nu Alpha—and have immeasurably upgraded the academic, char- r and other qualifications important for employment he field.

Traffic men like to get together. There are a tremen- s number of active traffic clubs which give young a chance to meet others in their profession and uss their common problems. This kind of activity g with the valuable educational activities of Delta Alpha and the American Society of Traffic and nsportation offers remarkable opportunity for a ng man's development.

pportunities for jobs are almost limitless. Industry ying for competent, trained traffic managers. A real tage exists.

is worth noting that half of the 267,000 factory rprises in the United States still do not employ a ic manager. This means that a really ambitious ng man, with a few years' experience, has an open l in front.

bviously, traffic management has a darker side to picture. A newcomer must recognize that he is not g to become a millionaire. Although wages can be e than comfortable, they are not astronomical. Furthermore, the first years may be pretty much of a grind. While you are learning the business, a great deal of routine work has to be done.

You'll also be irked to find that the name "traffic manager" is often used much too lightly in industry. Too frequently it is given to shipping clerks and others whose jobs don't warrant it.

This cannot be denied either. Once you get to be a traffic manager, you may well not go farther, though of course many do.

Where do girls fit into the industrial traffic management picture?

Opportunities are ample for them. Certainly the climb will be steeper for them than it is for boys. That is the case in most lines. Nevertheless, many girls are now in the field. A number have attained the top and are highly respected for their accomplishments.

Already there are more than fifty women's traffic clubs in the country. The Women's Traffic Club of New York alone has 500 members.

You ask what manner of youngster would do well in industrial traffic management? Unquestionably, he (or she) must have an ingrained love for transportation. He could well be the kind of boy who couldn't stop playing with model trains—or planes.

In my opinion, the boy thinking of industrial traffic management as a career should like geography; he will need to know the nation's maps inside out; have an excellent memory—he'll want it for memorizing rates and routes. Be adept at figures. Be a good logical talker. Be an affable, tactful type who gets along well with other people; personal contacts carry immense weight in this business.

Since he may be purchasing millions of dollars worth of transportation, he should be the type of boy who knows how to spend money wisely and who likes to shop around before he buys things.

In addition to their own company affiliations, most traffic managers belong to various clubs and associations where mutual problems are discussed. Above, at an executive meeting of the New York Commerce and Industry Association's Transportation Council, are traffic managers of some of America's leading corporations.

There is no set preparation for a post as an industrial traffic manager. A man with only a high school education can qualify, provided he's had enough practical experience. The careers of many distinguished traffic men attest to that. However, most companies now prefer college graduates.

It is best for a man to have had four years of college or its equivalent when he takes the Interstate Commerce Commission examination to be licensed to argue cases before that agency.

College should not be too much of a financial strain. Boys and girls can work their way through, and scholarships are available for the smarter ones. A drive is on right now to get industrial concerns to underwrite scholarships for young people interested in a transportation career.

I would suggest a general college education, rather than a purely business course. I have found that the man with a broad background and wide interests is generally best fitted for all aspects of life including business. If it is financially practicable, I feel that a young man would be wise to take a four-year general course and go on to a graduate school of business where he could specialize in transportation. Or he can go to one of the many colleges which offer a general educational course for two years and a business administration course for the last two.

A boy who can't get the money for full-time college can go to school after work. Most of the larger universities give night courses in traffic management. In many big cities he can also attend traffic institutes, sponsored by the transportation organizations, and study under traffic management "pros." Through such means, he can obtain the technical knowledge necessary to pass the I.C.C. examination and the examination for membership in the American Society of Traffic and Transportation, which will allow him to use the coveted designation following his name, "Member, A.S.T. & T."

One more point has to be made before I finish. Industry is not the only field for a traffic manager. He might be employed by a chamber of commerce or a board of trade. He might even have his own firm. In these capacities he would act as a consultant to both industry and carriers on transportation problems. If he prefers, he may move over from the buying side of transportation to the selling side in the "sales" or traffic department of a carrier organization, although the transfer usually works the other way.

All of these fields are admirable professions. No matter which a young man enters, he can be sure of an interesting, stimulating career—and the reward of knowing that he is helping to give his country the finest transportation system in the world.

maternal type likes things small, the courtesan type had a preference for large things. You, my dear Julia, are an outstanding example of the maternal type. The afflicted boy, the little dog, they make an appeal to you." He smiled. "But to poor Nicolas, handsome, healthy and head over ears in love with you, you could be, and were, quite cruel."

"I tried not to be, Mynheer. I didn't want him to fall in love with me. When he said he had, I discouraged him as gently as possible."

"Why?"

"Because, although I liked him, I didn't love him. And I bore in mind that I am married."

"Yes," said Mynheer, his voice grown heavy. "You are married. I will say this, Julia, sincerely and from my heart: your acceptance of an intolerable situation has, from the beginning, filled me with admiration. I told you once that you would find me not ungrateful. Were you blind to what I offered you?"

It was one of those dangerous questions to which either "yes" or "no" was an answer which gave recognition to what lay behind the question. She parried it feebly.

"I don't think I understand you. Everything you have given me I have accepted gratefully."

"I didn't say given; I said offered. I'm not heartless, Julia. I was obliged to find Pieter a wife. All these years I have presented a picture of him to the world, disfigured, misanthropic, but normal; and normal men, especially when they are heirs to great estates, have wives. I deliberately chose a Company's Daughter because I felt that a girl who had known some privation in her youth would more easily find some compensation in the comforts and small luxuries which I could offer; but I knew, very well, that in the end they would be inadequate. I brought Nicolas here deliberately, knowing that he would fall in love with you. I hoped that you would fall in love with him and accept from him all that Pieter could not give you—the pleasure of love, the joy of motherhood. Don't be embarrassed by this plain speaking; I am old enough in years to be your father. Dear Julia, why did you refuse?"

"Mynheer, one cannot be in love to order."

"Tell me this, then. On the day when you arrived in Banda, if Nicolas had met you, if he had been your husband—what then?"

"I often thought of that. It would have been my duty to love him, or to behave as though I did."

He gave her a long, hard look. "So you did at least consider it?"

"Yes. Nicolas was always very charming to me. He said he loved me. I thought about it. Any woman would have done."

Mynheer put out one of his slender, well-kept hands and laid it over hers.

"My dear," he said earnestly, "think again. You have behaved impeccably. In Pieter you have no husband; from him you will have no child. You are young now; you do not realize the measure of your loss, but it is a loss. Nicolas is deeply, genuinely in love with you. He has given proof of that; he has dared to write to his father saying that he will not honor his betrothal. That surprises you?"

"No. He spoke of it and I tried to dissuade him. I was appalled by the thought of his angering his family and spoiling his whole future on account of a passing fancy."

"It is not," said Mynheer, "a passing fancy. I can assure you of that. And Nicolas' future can be safely left to me. His father has other sons. Nicolas could remain here. In everything but name you could be husband and wife. Of what account, Julia, is a bit of ceremony, when set beside a real, overwhelming passion?"

None, she thought; knowing that if things had worked out as Doctor Hootman had foretold, she would have gone to Charles without hesitation.

She could see Mynheer waiting for an answer. She said slowly, "Mynheer, I hope that what you call an overwhelming passion will prove to be mere boyish infatuation. But in any case, the sincerity of Nicolas' feelings does not affect mine."

He withdrew his hand. Now he is angry, she thought, and braced herself.

"Well," he said, folding his hands together, "you're honest and sincere. Will you, just for a moment, look at it from another point of view? Mine."

She saw him change color; his yellow-gray complexion turned grayer and all the lines in his face seemed to deepen and darken.

"This family," he said, "is old, honorable. A long, unbroken line. Today you have been painting pots with Pieter Vosmar, the last of that line. I am to blame. I invited the curse and it fell." He unfolded his hands and took hold of the edge of the table, leaning forward. "Julia, you are my only hope. Give me a bud to graft onto this barren stock. Let me once hold your child in my arms ——"

He broke off; a frightening change took place in his face. Little blobs of foam formed at the corners of his mouth. Apparently conscious of them, he snatched up his table napkin and pressed it to his lips, saying through the muffle of the linen, "Nothing . . . trifling indisposition . . . leave me . . . go!"

She had jumped up and stood indecisive. She could remember Mevrouw Helmers saying in her bright airy way, "And then you may have fits to deal with. The symptoms are ——"

The symptoms she had listed so blithely bore a horrid similarity to what was happening to Mynheer. His whole body arched and strained as though it were in the grip of two maniac hands twisting against each other. His teeth clamped down in a rigor which held the table napkin firm after his hands had fallen away to clench on empty air.

And then, just as suddenly as it had set in, it was over. His teeth loosened and the table napkin fell to his knee. He gave a great sigh, his whole body relaxed and the perspiration broke out over his face.

But he was indomitable. With a shaking hand he lifted the napkin and mopped at his face and neck.

"This is nothing. Don't be frightened." He breathed as though he had been running.

"Can I do . . . or get you anything?"

"Glass of water, please."

She poured it and would have held it for him, but he insisted upon taking the glass himself. When he had drained it he said, more steadily:

"I'm sorry, Julia. It happens if I let my . . . emotions get the upper hand." He managed a ghastly smile. "You see how much it means to me. Think about it."

Terrified of provoking a further attack, she said, "Yes, I will. I'll think about it."

They did not meet again until dinnertime of the next evening. Mynheer appeared to be fully recovered. Julia, after another night spent in agonized indecision, had the worst headache of her life. Amusing Pieter during the afternoon had taxed her fortitude to its limit and she longed to creep away to her room and lie down in the dark; but to do so would look like evasion and merely postpone the evil moment.

Mynheer, just as on the previous evening, chatted, courteously, entertainingly. At last Pluto, moving noiselessly as a shadow, placed the fruit bowls and the decanters on the table and withdrew. This is the moment, she thought. It was like being on the gallows, with the noose round her neck and the cart under her feet about to pull away.

"You slept badly?" Mynheer's voice was kind and solicitous.

"I didn't sleep at all."

"Poor Julia. Try a little brandy. Believe me, it is the best restorative."

He poured some into a glass and handed to her. She lifted it. The scent of it had start its evocative business before the liquid tilted her lips. She set the glass down. She was conscious that it was brandy which Char had given her that day on the path, or tha was this brandy, poured by Mynheer, whi had, by its mere scent, called him so vividly mind. She only knew that now, all at once, s was certain.

"I have thought," she said, so firmly th she was surprised by the sound of her voi "I tried to look at it from your point of vie Mynheer. But I know that even if I sai would, in the end I shouldn't, so it's best say so."

There was a long silence. Out of the f from a great distance away, Mynheer sa kindly, sincerely, "Don't distress yours Julia. I'm very much disappointed. But decision was yours to make, after all."

Such calm acceptance, the last thing she expected, broke down all her defenses. S put her head in her hands and began to c Mynheer rose and came round the table, an arm around her shoulders and with other hand stroked her hair.

She lay in the bed, soothed by the m ments of Juno's firm brown hands, feelin though she were recovering from a long serious illness. She had made the right deci and Mynheer was not even angry. Her pe ful thoughts merged into sleep.

She began to dream again. This time it a happy dream. She was wearing a new d white sprigged with green, and she was p ing with Pieter, not in his private garden near the rose pergola at the back of the ho Doctor Hootman came walking under clusters of flowers and said, "Pieter, fetch J one of your pots."

"Beads," he said positively. He had a large number of them, big solid beads of many colors, bored with holes large enough to be threaded, without a needle, on lengths of lightly waxed string. He never strung them haphazardly, but with great care, naming each color as he threaded the bead: "White one . . . now red . . . green one."

As usual, all he made was for her. "Pretty for Julie." When, toward the middle of the morning, Mynheer came in, she was wearing a necklace of red, white and green, one of red and green and one of red and white. Pieter was breathing hard over a fourth, a green-and-white one.

Looking at Mynheer cautiously, she saw that he did not look well. But he spoke with cheerful kindness:

"Good morning, my dear. I trust you slept well. Hullo, Pieter; you're busy."

"Pretty for Julie," said Pieter.

"Very pretty." Mynheer turned to Echo. "You can go and get your dinner while I'm here. I'll send for you when I want you."

He came near the table and just touched Julia's beads with the tip of his finger.

"He does choose colors well," he said.

There was something rather pitiable in the way in which Mynheer was trying to find something in Pieter's favor.

Mynheer sat down, and after watching Pieter's fumbling yet persistent efforts for a moment said, "Oh, Julia, do something for me, will you? On the top shelf in the library there are some black books, numbered. I want number three. The steps are in position, you won't have to search. I don't feel like climbing this morning."

She went into the library and climbed the steps. The books were there. She found number three, and was balancing with it, and prepared to descend when she heard Pieter scream. The noise was nothing like that which he had made on the evening of Charles' visit. It was a shrill cry of sheer animal pain and terror. Then, in the same piercing voice, he called, "Julie! Julie!"

She threw down the book, scrambled from the steps and ran across the library. She pushed the heavy door and stood on its threshold for a second, immobilized by horror and disbelief. Pieter cowered in his chair, trying to protect his head. Mynheer stood over him, raining down blows with the cane.

She was across the floor, and had Mynheer's arm in both her hands, bearing down on it with all her force and weight, in the time it took her to think that he had gone mad. Nothing else could account for the insensate fury of the unprovoked attack.

Pieter, who had screamed each time the cane struck him, broke into a dismal whimper.

"That's just a start," said Mynheer a trifle breathlessly. "If I must, I'll beat him to death. Stand over there and watch."

"Mynheer," she said, "you're not well. You don't know what you're doing."

"Don't talk to me as though I were an idiot too! Stand back before I hit him again."

She took a pace backward. As she did so, Pieter, still holding his hands over his head, crouched low, scuttled across to her and pushed his face into her skirt. Red weals were coming up where the cane had hit him, and one of his ears was bleeding.

She put both hands on his shoulders and said, "It's all right, Pieter."

"Now you can listen to me," said Mynheer. "So far I've given him a flick or two with this light cane, but as God is in heaven, I swear I'll beat him until he is dead unless you give me your word to do what I want you to. I hate him. I always have. I've never looked at his ugly face without wanting to smash it in. And now I will—and you will watch it I have to tie you in a chair!"

Against her knees Pieter burrowed, whimpering. She looked down at him, and then into Mynheer's bulging eyes.

"You know I'd bear [illegible] grandchildren rather than see Pieter hurt," she said.

But Pieter had been hurt, and she had been tricked. Anger as well as acknowledgment of defeat moved in her; and a desire to hurt him.

"I only hope," she said, "that the Vosmar madness won't come out in Nicolas' child."

"You dare say that to me!" said Mynheer. He stepped forward, raised his hand and slapped her face, twice. He had to reach over Pieter to do it, but the blows were heavy enough to bring stinging tears to her eyes.

Between them Pieter lumbered to his feet. "Bad!" he said. "Bad. Hit Julie." He began to shamble forward, his head lowered, his heavy hands swinging.

"Keep away from me," cried Mynheer, raising his cane. But Pieter kept on.

Just too late Julie called, "Pieter. No!" Mynheer had lashed out, hitting Pieter across the face, and Pieter gave a great bellow of rage which drowned her voice. Bellowing, he put his hands around Mynheer's throat and began to shake him. Mynheer's feet chattered on the floor and then slipped. His fall brought Pieter down, too, but the puffy, limp-looking hands did not loose their hold.

Julia ran forward and took Pieter by the collar, crying, "Pieter. No. No. Pieter, stop."

It was like trying to restrain, trying to talk to a gorilla.

"Bad! Bad! Hurt Julie! Bad!" said Pieter, at each word lifting Mynheer a little way from the floor and smashing him down again.

She let go the collar, ran to the bell pull and tore at it, and then ran shouting to the door. She threw it open and found herself face to face with Doctor Hootman. Except that he wore a hat, had a two-day growth of beard and carried his little valise, he might have been returning from one of his casual strolls.

"They're killing each other " she screamed and jumped aside so that he could rush past her. By the time she had followed him back into the room he had his arms hooked into Pieter's elbows and had dragged him clear.

Pieter gave himself meekly into the hands of accustomed authority.

"Bad. Hurt Julie," he said once more. And then, with bright recognition, "Good morning, Doctor Daan." He put his hand to his bleeding ear, looked at his fingers and said in a tone of rebuke, "Dirty. Dirty."

Doctor Hootman was on his knees by the broken thing that lay on the floor. He opened Mynheer's frilled shirt, laid a hand on his breast, held it there for a minute and withdrew it.

"Nothing can be done about that," he said, getting to his feet. "Mevrouw, sit down"—he caught her as she swayed—"put your head on your knees." She felt his hand on the nape of her neck, bearing down. She heard him say, "Pieter, go in the garden. Garden. Get some flowers. Go and get some flowers for Julia."

Doctor Hootman's voice never lost its patient insistence, but she heard him give a sigh of relief as Pieter went lunging away.

"Mevrouw, are you feeling better? Stay as you are. I think I have some brandy here." She heard him moving about. Then he said, "Here, drink this."

She lifted her head and said helplessly, "I can't," and began to cry.

"That's right. Have a good cry. You'll feel better afterward."

He set the brandy within reach of her and went over to what lay on the floor. He stooped, and took from Mynheer's pocket the chain of keys, and then took out his own, a mere two or three held together by a leather strap.

Mopping at her streaming eyes, Julia watched him weighing the two lots of keys against each other. With a sudden movement he opened one of the drawers in the table, the drawer in which he kept a few of his personal belongings, and tossed the leather-held keys into it. The others he slipped into his pocket. Then he came over to her and asked kindly:

"Better now?"

She nodded. As soon as she thought her voice was to be trusted she said, "I thought you had gone to Macassar."

"So did I," said Doctor Hootman dryly. "So did he! But Nicolas was supposed to board the ship at Lonthoir. When there was no sign of him I disembarked. I realized that I—that we had been outwitted. Well, he'll never trick anyone again."

"Oh, don't!"

"It must have been very distressing for you. Oh, dear! How quick it can be about some things," he said, as Pieter, clutching a few crushed flowers, came blundering in. He laid them in Julia's lap.

"Thank you very much indeed, Pieter."

"I must bestir myself," Doctor Hootman said. "There's a great deal to do. Do you feel able to get to your room, Mevrouw? Then go and lie down. Just leave everything to me."

She stood up. She had to pass the place where the dead man lay, and though she meant not to look that way some kind of fascination made her, at the last moment, turn her head.

Doctor Hootman was spreading his handkerchief over the dead face.

At the head of the table Mynheer's chair was empty. Otherwise everything was as usual. Pluto, with his expressionless, trained-house-slave face, brought in the dishes. It was difficult to realize that Mynheer was not merely dining in Banda.

There was, however, one slight difference. Tonight Julia wore the dress in which she had arrived: the plain, dull, serviceable garment with which every Company's Daughter was supplied. And tonight she wore no jewels.

"Good evening, Mevrouw," said Doctor Hootman, taking his accustomed place. "I trust that you feel rested and restored."

"Yes, I do, thank you," she said.

He had been, she thought, wonderfully considerate. She had gone to her room and had sat there, sick and shivering, for half an hour. Then Doctor Hootman had come along, with a glass in his hand, saying that he imagined she would welcome a sedative. She had taken it and slept all through the afternoon.

"If you are agreeable," said Doctor Hootman, "we will wait upon ourselves. There are several things to be settled, and not much time. Very well, Pluto, you may go." As the door closed he said, "It is remarkable, though not, perhaps, surprising, that the tragedy has been accepted with such calm. Rua has always run as though by machinery."

"It would be hypocrisy for me to pretend to any grief," she said.

"Exactly. No doubt everybody feels the same—to some degree. Of course if Pieter were capable of occupying that chair, some show of mourning would be expedient."

"How is Pieter? I should have gone along to see him, but I slept so long."

"He is somewhat shaken. Not by the thought of what he did—he seems to have forgotten that. But he cried when I dressed the wound on his ear and showed signs of very considerable disturbance. Of course nobody has ever struck him before in his life. What happened, Mevrouw?"

She told him. At the end she said, "I don't know why, but it all seems to have happened much longer ago than this morning."

"You have slept. And your mind is putting up its own defense. If I could I would spare you all exertion and say leave everything to me, but there are things which I am forced to discuss with you because I need your help. With the funeral."

"You know best about such things."

"Ah, but this is no ordinary funeral!" He looked from his now-empty plate to her untouched one. "Mevrouw, you have eaten nothing!"

"I'm not hungry. I don't think I shall ever be hungry again."

"Try, at least," he said. "Try some fruit."

He rose and carried his plate to the side table, then removed hers and set a clean plate and two bowls of fruit before her.

"We face," he said, "a problem quite unique, or so I should imagine. You are aware, Mevrouw, of the picture of Pieter which Mynheer always presented to the world. We must, at all costs, conceal the fact that Pieter is not, in the legal sense, competent. If we do not, I can foresee danger from two quarters. First, the family. Once let the secret of Pieter's condition leak out and down they will swoop, like vultures."

"They would want Rua," she suggested.

"They would take Rua. So much for the family. The other threat comes from the Company. Land tenure in the islands is largely dependent upon the Company's good will. Rua is undeniably Vosmar property, but how long would they allow it to remain in the possession of an idiot? On the slightest excuse, or no excuse at all, someone would whisper 'maladministration.' You and Pieter would then become wards of the Company. I trust I am making myself clear, Mevrouw."

"Very clear, Doctor Hootman."

"Good. So here we are, back at the problem of the funeral. Mynheer was a prominent man; many people will come to see him laid with his fathers in the family burial place. I cannot help but feel that any man, however retiring, would feel it incumbent upon him to attend the funeral of his own father. All our efforts have not prevented suspicions of a mental rather than a physical affliction, and unless Pieter Vosmar puts in an appearance at eleven o'clock on Monday morning, those suspicions are going to be confirmed. You see our quandary?"

"Yes," she said. But it was his quandary; she could understand but not share it.

Doctor Hootman pushed his chair back. "We must provide a substitute. Someone who knows what Pieter is and whom we can trust. Now—does the name occur to you?"

"Not —— You don't mean Charles?"

"I do indeed! Who else?"

"He wouldn't do it," she said.

"Show him a guilder and he would do anything," said Doctor Hootman. "He lost everything in the Civil War, and though the actual land has been restored, the house is a ruin. His mother and brother live like peasants. Charles lives in daily danger for the sake of money, and in the hope of one day returning home. For him, at least, that day is much nearer than he dreams, if we play our cards with skill—and courage."

Now, she knew, she must think for herself.

"Tell me exactly what you propose to do."

"Well, first, as regards the funeral. I suggest that when the mourners have assembled, you and Charles come at the last moment and stand inside the burial ground, near enough to be associated with the ceremony, but far enough away to avoid close inspection. I can disfigure him, with a scar, convincing enough at a distance. And, of course, it is a funeral; a handkerchief held to the face would be allowable."

The last words enabled her to recognize the nature of her objection. It all sounded sly and shady, out of keeping with everything that she remembered about the man she loved.

"All other considerations apart," said Doctor Hootman, "I am sure that Charles no more than I would wish to see you at the mercy of the family or of the Company. Once the funeral is safely over it is all smooth sailing. From the privacy of his room he will conduct his business, through me. I have amused myself by perfecting a style of handwriting and a signature quite unlike my own. I assure you I can run Rua, even to the Company's satisfaction."

Smooth, feasible, cunning. Why object? Somebody must run Rua; Pieter could not, so why shouldn't Doctor Hootman?

"I'm sure you could," she said. "But it does mean keeping up all that burden of pretense. I am Pieter's legal wife and I am in my right mind. You understand the business. Couldn't we admit what Pieter is and act for him?"

Doctor Hootman did not answer immediately. His hand went to his chin. His jowls had darkened. "The drawback to that is that it leaves us just where we are. You the wife of an idiot, and me the hired man. Frankly, I visualized a rather more attractive future."

"Whether we pretend or not, that is what we are; I'm Pieter's wife, you're his agent."

"Ah—but let us look a little farther into the future. I will now allow myself the use of a sentimental expression. Poor Pieter. Poor Pieter's kind seldom live long. Eight years ago, when I took charge of him, he was moribund, dying very slowly. I set myself to keep him alive. And I succeeded. Every one of those trivial little activities has been a peg, holding Pieter Vosmar and life together. You understand me? Deprived of his activities, he will die within three months."

Her mouth had gone dry. "And you will so deprive him?"

"Immediately after the funeral."

Once, long ago, she had told Mynheer that she thought he was cruel; she was wiser now.

"And then what happens?"

SLOW ART

By GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

Did Paderewski play Chopin
The day his hands first touched the keys?
With his first chisel did Rodin
Turn stone into a masterpiece?

Then why should neophytes in love
Suppose that from the very start
They must be polished masters of That complex instrument, the heart?

The native talent must be trained
By time and practice, part or wholly.
All virtuosity's attained.
And love's an art that's mastered slowly.

"Then, Mevrouw, we come into our own. That sane, nonexistent Pieter Vosmar will have made his will. To you he will have left the bulk of his fortune; to me he will have left his estate, Rua."

"I see," she said.

There was so much to see. Not only the future. The past was all at once brilliantly illuminated. Now she saw why Doctor Hootman had been on guard that evening, why he had encouraged her not to fall in with Mynheer's plan. An heir to Rua had no place in his schemes. And his schemes were as farfetched and as cold-blooded as Mynheer's.

Doctor Hootman seemed to mistake the reason for her long silence. He said, defensively, almost placatingly:

"You must not grudge me my share, Mevrouw. Remember what my life has been these eight years. If ever a man earned anything, I have earned Rua."

She said hastily, "Oh, I agree. I don't grudge it. I don't want it myself. After all that has happened here, I should like to go away and never see the place again."

"And that is exactly what you can do, Mevrouw. Very soon. You will be rich and free, and still young. I have imagined, in my sentimental way, that there is a mutual attraction between you and Charles. If that develops you can go back to England with him. If it does not—well, you are a very attractive woman, and you will be rich; you will also enjoy what you have earned."

The one essential was that he should continue to believe her to be co-operative.

"Oh, we've earned it," she said with a pretended heartiness. But ——" She hesitated. "Pieter saved me from a dreadful situation, and that makes me feel that I don't want anything that depends on his being dead. There must be some other way."

Quite amiably Doctor Hootman said, "I am open to suggestion, Mevrouw."

"Suppose," she began tentatively, "that I took him away. You could just as easily pretend that a sane Pieter Vosmar existed without the real one locked in that room, couldn't you?"

"Rather more easily; but I think you underestimate the difficulty of the removal. It involves—to say the least—a passage on a ship. If one day Mevrouw Vosmar boards a ship, dragging behind her thirteen stone of plain idiocy, wouldn't that give rise to comment? Inquiry?"

"I suppose it would. I'm not a very good planner, am I? Then couldn't we just wait?" Without being aware of it, she lifted her head and spoke in a firmer manner.

"I've done my waiting. Eight years of it." His voice changed, became soothing. "He won't suffer, you know; he'll just die, gently and gradually, as very old people do. You may comfort yourself with the thought that neither you nor anyone else can stop me now."

Once again she was in conflict with a ruthless and determined man, with nothing but her wits for weapon. "If you can assure me that he won't suffer ——"

"I can do that. All these years he has been kept alive by what you might call artificial means. I have supplied the stimulus, now I shall remove it. That is all."

Like saying that a person kept alive by breathing; put a pillow over his face, remove the stimulus and that is all.

"When do you expect Charles?" she asked.

"Tomorrow. He will be expecting to see Mynheer on business. I think he will be pleasantly surprised."

"I've so often wondered about that business."

"There's no harm in your knowing," Doctor Hootman said pleasantly. "In defiance of all rules, Mynheer continued to grow cloves, and of course the ordinary channels of disposal were closed to him. Charles was his outlet. Dear me, that reminds me! Those trees must come down. Tomorrow. I am deeply obliged to you, Mevrouw, for bringing them to my mind. I thought that Charles would act for me on Monday partly from desire for money, partly for your sake, partly even to oblige me; I had overlooked, until this moment, the most powerful motive of all, the need to save his own skin. On Monday morning Rua wouldn't be a very healthy spot for an English clove smuggler unless he was in disguise, would it?" The facial change which was not quite a smile became visible again.

So that was it. And she did not for a moment believe that the thought had just occurred to him.

"I've thought of another thing too," she said. "Wouldn't it look better, more natural, more in order, if Nicolas were at the funeral?"

"Admirable! Actually, I sent for him this morning. His presence is necessary. I regret it, though. I think his curiosity concerning Pieter constitutes our one real danger. Pieter will just have to refuse to see him, promise to do so and then postpone the meeting. We must deal with that as it comes."

"Of course," she said. She knew now what she must manage. Tomorrow she must meet Charles as soon as he set foot on Rua, warn him and send him straight away again. Then she must see Nicolas and tell him everything; that would save Pieter.

Another bad night; and this time, in the heart of it something new; this time side by side with the old confusion and fear and feeling of weakness and despair there came a real and very urgent temptation. Why not give in? To have given in to Mynheer would have meant going against her own feelings and against her deepest instincts; to give in to Doctor Hootman would be in exact accordance with them. Why not do what she wanted? Why should she bother whether a hopeless idiot lived another year or so of useless life?

Then the other arguments began. hadn't survived in Cloonmagh by virtu hardihood or heartlessness, but becaus kindness and pity. Johannes had saved from starvation; Charles had saved her Mynheer's wrath; Pieter, pitiably acquie when he was attacked, had risen up in defense ——

Tomorrow, somehow, she must outwit tor Hootman.

Fifty years later, when she was an woman, one of the trees in the long av from which Elmhurst took its name was f to be unsafe and had to be taken down that clear cold day in the English winte walked, leaning on the arm of one o grandsons, to see the end of the vene tree. The sound of the axes striking home her straight back, across half a century, a half a world, to that Sunday in Rua.

"It might have been yesterday," she suddenly.

"What might?"

"The day when your grandfather aske to marry him," she said. And the boy had never been farther afield than Canter saw in his mind's eye a piece of English shaded—since this was in foreign parts palm trees, and in the shade a pair of figures bearing no resemblance to his g parents, placidly plighting their troth sealing it with a chaste kiss.

That Sunday in Rua had not been lik at all.

In the morning she had gone to see H His face and neck were marked with bruises and his ear was swollen to tw normal size. He was pleased to see her. her hand and rubbed his head against shoulder, but something had gone out of

"Of course," she said.

"I've decided that when those tree down, the flowers and the foliage mu buried, not burned. The scent would ably hang about till tomorrow; so I mu trenches dug. But I'll relieve you as soo can." He hurried away.

path he would take on his way back to the plantation. At last she saw what she had been waiting for, the heavy somber figure making its way across the garden and through the rose pergola. She forced herself to wait a little and then set off in a state of nervousness.

This afternoon she must take the path which ran past Psyche's cage. It was the way Charles had come on that fateful afternoon and she hoped to meet him there again today.

There was still something sinister about the path. She hurried past the cage, not looking that way. The path narrowed and began to slope upward; when at last she came to the edge of the grove and could see the sea it lay between twenty and thirty feet below, at the foot of a sheer cliff thickly clothed with ferns, with pink azaleas and the far-flung, twining wreaths of the island honeysuckle.

At this point the sea had taken a bite out of the island, making a little cove, a perfect place for surreptitious landing, shielded on either side from observation.

All this Julia noticed, but she failed to see that today the little cove was awash with the incoming tide. The narrow strip of beach at the cliff's foot was already under water; presently the sea would reach the level where the lowest ferns grew. It would be hours before any boat could beach there. Ignorant of this, she went to the cliff's edge and stared out into the shimmering blue distance. She willed Charles to come, and to come quickly, with an urgency which left her as exhausted as a fierce physical effort would have done. Nothing stirred on the silken skin of the sea.

Soon it would be dark. Before dark she must be back in the house. Up to the moment when she told Nicolas everything she must retain Doctor Hootman's confidence. Though she had failed to meet and warn Charles, she might, even yet, save Pieter.

She had run a long way before the comforting thought struck her that perhaps Charles did not intend to come to Rua. Perhaps Doctor Hootman's message had miscarried. In that case everything would be simple and easy; just take Nicolas to Pieter's room and it would be done.

When she reached the pergola she adopted the sauntering gait of one who had, in the lessening heat, merely taken a stroll. It was as well that she did so, for Doctor Hootman was standing on the steps, scanning the garden even as he placed a hand on the arm of Nicolas, who had evidently just arrived. Both men came toward her, but Nicolas, by breaking into a run, reached her first. He began to say "Poor Julia, it must have been awful for you ——" By interrupting him she had just time to say, "I must see you alone. There's so much to tell," before Doctor Hootman joined them.

"Mevrouw," he said, "I have looked for you everywhere. Pieter is being most difficult about tomorrow. You must talk to him."

His voice was heavy with hidden meaning and she understood that Charles had come.

Nicolas, taking the words at their face value, said, tightening his arm, "You can leave that to me, Julia. Ever since I heard the awful news I've been thinking about Pieter. He'll have to drop all his nonsense now, and I think I should be the one to tell him so."

"It may come to that," said Doctor Hootman, "but I feel that Mevrouw should try her persuasions first. Perhaps it would be as well to leave him for a little while and refresh ourselves. Mevrouw has eaten nothing all day; you, Mynheer, have been traveling; and even I ——" He spread his hands.

"You must have been very busy," Nicolas said.

They went into the room with the Chinese cabinets. A cloth had been spread on one of the tables, and set out upon it were the dishes always served in the islands on casual occasions: small cakes; fruit, fresh and preserved; highly spiced and pickled vegetables; meat and fish. There was also a bottle of wine, which Doctor Hootman, with a nice show of courtesy, left for Nicolas to handle.

There began, and lasted for about ten minutes, what, in retrospect, Julia thought was perhaps the most fantastic little scene of all. Nicolas was young enough to find any death disconcerting. He had been genuinely fond of his Uncle Simon. He took it for granted that they shared his grief.

"It was so appallingly sudden," he said. "He was in good health when I left."

"Not quite so good as it seemed, Mynheer. He was very sensitive on the subject, but he had had one or two minor attacks in the last few months. That was one reason why he was beginning to delegate more and more responsibility to me."

"Was it a stroke?" Nicolas asked.

"Of a kind. A seizure. There's this to be thankful for: he didn't suffer at all."

"I still can't believe that I shall never see him again. He was quite unlike anybody else, wasn't he? So amusing, and understanding, and kind."

As he said these words he looked at Julia as though asking her to agree and confirm.

She forced herself to say, "Yes, he could be very kind."

Their eyes met, and in his she saw, behind the distress, something else move, sharp and active. He was remembering her words upon meeting.

"You do look poorly, Julia," he said. "Let me take you to your room."

"Mevrouw must see Pieter first," said Doctor Hootman.

"Why can't I do that for her?" Nicolas asked.

"For the simple reason that being confronted by a stranger—which is, with all respect, what you are to him—would merely upset and anger him and leave him less open to reason. Mevrouw has far more chance of success. In fact, if Mevrouw cannot persuade him to make an appearance tomorrow, I don't know who can!"

"Now I'll tell you something," said Nicolas. "The Barnveltes, with whom I have been staying, asked me a lot of questions about Pieter. They could hardly believe that I had stayed here for weeks and never set eyes on him. And if Pieter shirks his own father's funeral ——"

"I know, I know," said Doctor Hootman worriedly. "He must be persuaded."

"I still think I should talk to him," Nicolas said. "I'd contrive to act in such a way as to convince him that he hasn't all that much wrong with him."

"That," said Doctor Hootman, "would be extremely easy. When you see him, you'll be surprised to find how little is wrong with him. Don't you agree, Mevrouw?"

"I always said so," she said dully.

Suddenly she could bear it no longer. "Let's go and get it over with." She stood up.

"I shall take a little walk," Nicolas said. "Then I'll come back here and hear how you succeeded. And if he's still stubborn I shall have a talk with him. I think you all pay too much attention to his fancies and foibles."

"Perhaps," Doctor Hootman said easily. "But you see—to those who know him, Pieter is very lovable."

And that, also, was for her ear alone.

"When did Charles arrive?" she asked, as they went along the cloister.

"A few minutes before you came back from your walk. His immediate response was uncooperative. But I had done no more than outline the situation when that boy arrived."

They halted by the library door and Doctor Hootman took out Mynheer's bunch of keys.

"Now I have to lock this door," he said, with an almost humorous look.

The door opened and Charles, who had been lolling in a chair, jumped up. He held out his hand and she put hers in it; he put his other over hers so that her cold, unsteady hand was sandwiched between his two firm ones. He said, in a voice warm with sympathy:

"Poor little girl, you have been through it. But it's all over now. Come and sit down."

"Yes," said Doctor Hootman, turning from his relocking of the door. "Sit down, Mevrouw, and let us get this thing settled. Well, Charles; have you thought it over?"

"I have," Charles said. He sat down in a chair beside her. "I'm sorry to be disobliging, Daan. There isn't much I wouldn't do for a guilder, but I must draw the line at hiring out as a mummer."

"Now look here ——" Doctor Hootman said, his jowls beginning to darken.

Charles cut in: "What's more, you should thank God that this wasn't something you could rush into on your own. The old chap's death gave you a jolt, Daan, and you've gone a bit off course. You've thought up a scheme that nobody with a grain of sense in his head would entertain for a moment."

"I refute that," said Doctor Hootman, who had recovered his composure. "My plan is above all, eminently practical."

"How much do you know about this?" Charles asked, turning to Julia.

"A good deal more than you do, my friend," Doctor Hootman answered for her.

"Then you can see that it's crazy, can't you?"

She weighted her words with every hint of warning that an innocent-seeming speech could carry. "Doctor Hootman has thought about this plan for years, Charles. He thinks it feasible, and he's very—very set on it."

"A slight understatement," said Doctor Hootman, "but good enough. And you call it crazy. Why?"

"It's crazy because you couldn't carry it through. Say what you like about Simon Vosmar, he had a sort of power. People were scared of him. Nobody came here except by direct invitation. You wouldn't have that authority. Before you knew where you were somebody would up and say, 'Who is this Doctor Hootman to stand between me and the man I want to do business with?' Or, 'I'm going to see Pieter Vosmar.' The thing wouldn't hold together for more than three months," Charles said.

"It has no need to. Grief, the press of business inseparable from sudden demise would surely protect Pieter Vosmar from intrusion for three months. And after that there would be nothing to hide."

"He'd still be here, plain idiot."

Perhaps when he knew what Doctor Hootman planned for Pieter he would realize what kind of man he was and be on guard. That thought made her say, quickly:

"But Pieter wouldn't be here, Charles. Doctor Hootman thinks that if Pieter is deprived of all his little occupations and interests he won't live very long."

The silence seemed to stretch itself out to give everyone in the room a chance to contemplate the future in terms of Pieter dead. Doctor Hootman spoke first.

"Mere chivalry compels me to point out, Charles, that over this detail Mevrouw did register a protest. But I managed to convince her that his—I assure you, painless—death would benefit us both. You see, the mythical, sane Pieter Vosmar is going to make his will. Mevrouw will get his money and I shall have Rua."

This time the silence was longer. Charles got up, very slowly and deliberately.

"Julia," he said, "this isn't the time or the place to say such things"—and he did look embarrassed. "I do love you, very dearly. I wouldn't have said so except that I don't want you to think —— God knows I wish you were free, but not this way! If I say no to this, Julia, don't go thinking ——"

His voice trailed away because, screened for a moment from Doctor Hootman's view she was screwing her face into grimaces of warning and conspiracy.

"It is so many years since I saw a play," said Doctor Hootman, "that if time permitted I should enjoy this touching scene. As it is—Charles, will you oblige me by leaving the irrelevancies and saying whether or not you are prepared to help me tomorrow?"

With one last puzzled look at Julia, Charles turned about, and threw himself into his chair.

"With the mummery, no. I thought I had made that clear. Pick something easier, and I'll help you. Collar the cashbox or a sackful of silver plate, or a whole load of unlimed nuts."

"That's the English all over," said Doctor Hootman. "Noble sentiments and mercenary motives. You're looking ahead to the time when Mevrouw may inherit everything."

Offensive as the speech was, Julia welcomed it; surely now Charles would see that Doctor Hootman was not his friend.

He said, quite unruffled, "You're wrong there, and I can prove it. Call the nephew or whatever he is in, and hand over to him, and Julia can come away with me tonight." He swung round to Julia. "I'm taking a lot for granted, but I'd look after you. Married or not makes no difference, I'm yours for life."

"Will you stop talking sentimental rubbish!" said Doctor Hootman. "I've told you what I propose to do. I need Mevrouw. Will you get into your thick English skull that nobody, nothing is going to turn me from my purpose? Now, are you going to help me?"

"No. Get that into your thick Dutch skull." He said it without rancor.

"Then I must think of an alternative," said the doctor quite calmly.

"This time think of something that won't take you straight to a rope's end at Banda Fort."

Doctor Hootman's hand had gone to his chin. He leaned forward as though they were two children to whom he—an adult—was ing a fairy story which had just reached exciting climax. "I have, I think, the pe solution. I've known all along that it woul difficult to convert your rugged good l into something that would account for P Vosmar's behavior. I could have done it, it would not have been easy. This is. P Vosmar shunned the sight of men beca poor fellow, he had colored blood! It w be beneath Mercury's dignity to stand by grave tomorrow; and the beauty of it is the closer he is inspected, the more obv will be his reason for hiding. Charles, I you a deep debt of gratitude."

"Who's this Mercury?"

"A slave. Quite three quarters white."

"And you seriously consider a scheme depends on him? What about the o slaves?"

"No other slave will be at the graves Mynheer would as soon have had his cow his funeral."

"All right. Think for a moment of you're putting yourself into this Mercu hands."

"I put myself in nobody's hands," Doctor Hootman. "Not in yours which, Pilate, you have so carefully washed; no Mevrouw's, so dainty and gentle. I know she'd ruin everything for the sake of an i who can't tell Sunday from Monday!" T was venom in his voice. "Luckily she is sentimental about you. So tomorrow she lean, very lovingly and convincingly, on M cury's arm; because you, my English cl smuggling friend, will be here, pledge of good behavior! Even the tide served me, see. If you had landed in the usual place s have met you with words of warning on lips."

So now it was all out. "That is quite tru she said quickly. "I am against your pla because of Pieter. But I promise, I give you word, if you let Charles go I'll do anyth you tell me to, tomorrow and afterward."

Charles reached out and took her ha "Thank you," he said. "But you can't barg with a crazy man. All right, Daan, what not Doctor Hootman stood up, took the k from his right-hand pocket and transfe them into his left hand. His right hand he into his pocket again, and kept it there.

"What now? Why, now you can conti your love scene while I find Mercury and him dressed and ready to meet his kinsma Still facing them, he edged sideways and ba ward toward the door.

There was now in the room, in the wh situation, an air of unreality and of fals She, at least, knew where it originated- Charles' behavior. Why didn't he do so thing? Just to sit there, holding her hand looking at it as if it were the most wonde thing in the world ——

She decided to try something on her o More than once during the last few min she had been aware of a sound of moven in Pieter's room. If she mentioned it now, Doctor Hootman went to investigate, as most surely would, he would cross the ro Charles could shoot out his legs and trip h make a grab for the keys, do something. twisted her hand and dug her nails into Cha palm, hintfully, and said:

"Doctor Hootman, I can hear Pieter m ing about."

He laughed outright. "Dear Mevrouw! wonder you love her, Charles! She's wond ful. I could almost love her myself."

"But it is true. I can hear him."

"His movements have ceased to conc me," said Doctor Hootman. He gave attention to putting the key into the door w his left hand and without turning.

Then Charles jumped.

It was like the leap of a panther, swift a sudden and silent. The older man was much taken by surprise—Julia thought—t he did not even remove his right hand from pocket as Charles' hand fell on his neck. he did was to put the keys behind him, a c ously childish, futile gesture. When Cha reached for them and began to twist his wr maintaining at the same time his grip on neckband, Doctor Hootman said in a chok voice, "You're throttling me. All rig ıave them!" And he flung the keys to the loor. It was all over in half a minute.

Without letting go of the linen, Charles half tooped and reached for the keys. Then Doc- or Hootman's right hand came out of the ocket, its fingers clenched round the barrel of short pistol. As Julia screamed he brought it lown, with deliberately measured force, on the ack of Charles' skull, just behind the ear. Charles' body gave a convulsive jerk and went imp. As his hand loosened and his arm lowered Doctor Hootman caught it, breaking his fall nd letting him down quite gently to the floor.

She ran forward crying, "You've killed im."

"Nonsense," said Doctor Hootman cheer- ully. "One does not kill a hostage. A mere abbit punch which will keep him quiet for alf an hour. You'll find brandy in that cup- oard, but don't give it to him while he is nconscious; many people have been choked hat way."

He unlocked the door and as she knelt by Charles she heard the key turn on the other ide and the sound of his footsteps going along he cloister.

Despite the reassuring words and the logic ehind them, she was frightened when she ooked at Charles' face. But he was breathing, hallowly and a little noisily, and his heart was eating.

The wound was nothing; a thin sluggish rickle of blood ran from it and beaded slowly t the edge of his hair, and even that stopped s, under her eyes, the swelling began. The ump grew visibly and with incredible rapidity. he took comfort, remembering Mevrouw Ielmers' theory that the more an accident or lness manifested itself, the less dangerous it as. Sitting down on the floor, she took harles' head in her lap.

Except for the sound of Charles' breathing, he room was very quiet. Now and again a ight bird cried raucously. She could hear the ea slapping gently at the jetty and whispering n the beach.

And then she could hear something else: ieter was still moving about. Ordinarily he ept from his early bedtime until dawn, but he ad been unlike himself all day.

She had seen Doctor Hootman toss his own eys into the table drawer.

Pieter knew one object from another; if he anted his scissors, it was useless to offer him is knitting.

It was so frail a chance that she was almost eluctant to recognize it; but it was a chance. he laid Charles' head on the floor, rose to er feet and went to the door of Pieter's room, pped on it lightly and called his name.

Absolute silence answered her.

She tried again. "Pieter, it's Julie."

No sound. Was it her imagination which tributed a strained, listening quality to the lence?

"Pieter, I want to come in. Want to see ieter. The door is locked."

No reply. No movement. Only that feeling at she was not speaking to emptiness, the eling of someone there, listening.

"Doctor Daan's drawer, Pieter. The key. Look for the key in Doctor Daan's drawer. Get the key, Pieter. Let Julie in."

It was like trying to thread a fine needle with coarse thread while wearing three pairs of gloves. The effort to impose her will, to make him understand and act, was so great that she seemed to be in the dark, all the light of her consciousness poured out, streaming away toward him. His mind was so limited, a key might be outside his range of recognition; the key might not even be there. Oh, God! Our only chance; this door once open and I could run through, into Pieter's little garden and over the wall, I could find Nicolas ——

Doctor Hootman's drawer always screeched a little when it was opened and that sound now, harsh in the silence, turned her faint. Her hands tingled and pricked as though touched by nettles. He was there. He did understand.

"It's the long key, Pieter," she told him. "Long key."

All was quiet again. She could imagine him standing there, perhaps even with the keys in his hand, blankly wondering what next to do.

It was almost impossible to speak calmly.

"The long key, Pieter," she repeated. "In this door. Push it in."

He could thread a bead on a string, he could unlock a door. But he had to be told things over and over. She went on telling him. The sound of the key, pushed, with the minimum of fumbling, into the lock sent the tingling prickle all over her.

The lock clicked. She put her hand on the latch and for half a second it resisted her. Then it moved and the door opened.

But it wasn't Pieter who stood there with bits of leaf and twig in his hair, his face and shirt front smeared with green.

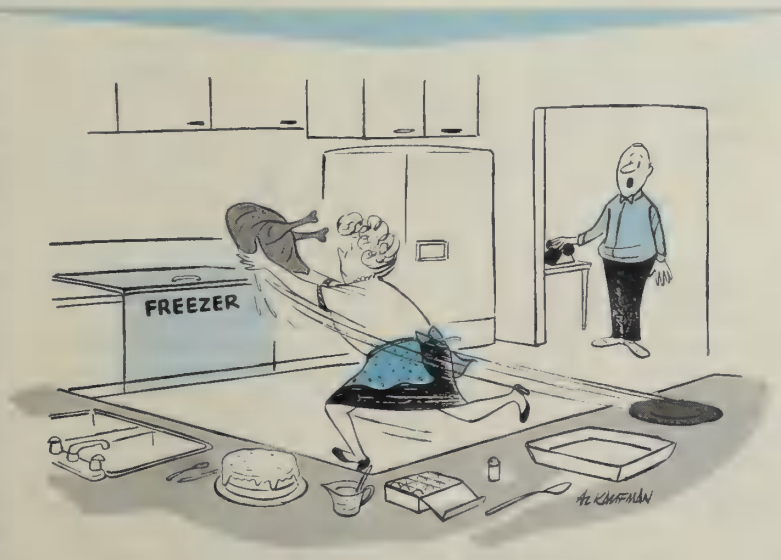
It was Nicolas.

Now she knew full, perfect happiness. People said that the times when you were happy went by unrecognized, that only afterward, when you looked back, when the joy had gone over, you said nostalgically, "I was happy then." That wasn't true; she was happy, and she knew she was happy and reveled in it.

One shining happy day slid into another, there were no nights. There were no anxieties, no responsibilities. Even the effort to speak was not demanded of her.

It was a blue-and-white April day on Cloonmagh; the clouds raced across the sky and their shadows raced over the shining sands. All the air was full of the fresh clean scent of the sea. She ran on the beach and Maire was there; not the sad, emaciated Maire of the later days, but the earlier, just-remembered Maire, full of hope and strange old tales.

Then it was summer. She wore a pretty cool dress and her loosened hair brushed against her neck. She walked along the sun-filled streets with Uncle Johannes. They paused by a tavern on the corner and he said, "Are you thirsty, sweetheart? I am." Inside it was cool and she drank something deliciously flavored with lemons.



It was no season, one of the warmth-laden, spice-filled island days. She sat on her favorite seat, overlooking the bank of flowers, all pink and purple against the sapphire sea. Charles sat on the ground beside her. He said, "I love you very dearly." There was still no need for her to speak. She tightened her arm around his neck and bent down and laid her face against his hair.

She was in her own room, playing the clavichord better than she had ever heard anyone play. Wonderful music. Because of it she did not hear the door open, and Psyche and Katje were there beside her before she was aware of them. But she was not startled; they looked so well, and so happy. Pieter came and said, "Pretty. Pretty for Julie." Unlike the others, he did not look well, or happy. There were all his things laid out on the table behind him and he was doing nothing. She knew that she must make an effort to rouse him. To him she must speak.

"Pieter, cut some paper. Cut some paper for Julia." She held out the blunt-nosed scissors.

From somewhere immeasurably far away someone said, "Pieter is quite all right. There's no need to worry about him."

And she knew that that was true. Nicolas would look after everything.

"The Johnsons can't make it for dinner tonight."

It was evening and the candles were lighted. Two faces were looking down at her. One was a woman's, pale and fat and plain under the edge of a little linen cap.

I don't know you! Julia thought. The other was a man's, thin, sharp-featured. I don't know you either.

The man said, "There. I told you there was no reason for alarm. Merely a matter of time and good nursing."

The voices pursued her for a little while: one said something about a natural, healing sleep and being much better tomorrow; the other, female, rather lugubrious, said something about a daughter. A sleep, a daughter . . . but they are not my people, this is not my place, I shall go away again.

She heard Nicolas' voice and the woman's. Now she must wake properly; she must speak to Nicolas. There was so much she didn't know, and must know.

She opened her eyes; there was Nicolas, looking anxious, and the woman. She was familiar, after all: Mevrouw van de Lijn, the governor's wife. What was she doing here?

Nicolas was now on his knees by the bed. "Julia. Do you know me?"

"Nicolas ——" There he had stood, in the doorway, and she had known that he had climbed the wall of the little private garden and must have come through Pieter's room, and knew everything. That was where reality had broken off; she had thought, He knows, it will be all right now, and then she had gone down into the dark.

"Everything's all right, Julia," he said.

"Charles?"

"Perfectly well and all right. I promise you. Nothing in all the world to worry about. You just lie still and get better."

"Pieter?"

"He's all right. I'm taking care of him. I'm taking care of everything."

"You know about it all?"

"Everything."

Mevrouw van de Lijn came to the other side of the bed, lifted her a little and held a glass to her lips. Milk, creamy and very cold. Lovely.

She wanted to know more about Charles, but her mind was active now; mustn't talk about Charles in front of the governor's wife.

"Everything is all right? Everybody safe?"

"Safe as houses. You go back to sleep again, Julia."

Next time she woke everything was quite different. It was morning, she knew by the way the sun came in from the window on the cloister side. She was alone in the room and as soon as she woke misery assailed her. Her mind was perfectly clear, she remembered everything; she remembered Nicolas saying that everything was all right—but how could she believe that? All the dread possibilities of the situation she had abandoned when she fell down by the door now came thronging back; how could Nicolas have dealt with everything, with two senseless people flat on the floor and Doctor Hootman coming back, pistol in hand? How could she have allowed herself to be so easily lulled by a few soothing words?

She began to cry and instantly the door of her bathroom opened and out rushed Mevrouw van de Lijn, clad in her petticoat.

"My dear, my dear," she cried, hurrying to the bed. "What is the matter? You mustn't upset yourself—the very worst thing. You're better, everything is all right."

"I don't know anything. I don't even know what day it is. Why are you here? And my hair—who cut my hair?"

"I did. You have been ill, you know. The doctor advised it."

"Doctor Hootman?"

"Oh, no, no. Doctor van Nagel, from Banda. You see, we had to put wet cloths on your head to cool your brain, and the hair was in the way. You mustn't fret about that. It'll grow again. I can say that for certain. My own little girl had to have hers cut, and do you know, it grew again in the loveliest curls you ever saw, though it had been straight as a poker."

"Why are you here, Mevrouw?"

"I've been looking after you, my dear. I came for the funeral and I heard you were ill, so I stayed and took care of you."

"That was very kind. You came for the funeral, Mevrouw. Was it yesterday?"

"No, my dear. On Monday. Today is Friday. You have been ill, you know. Four whole days. We were very worried; but Doctor van Nagel assured us there was no need. He said you must have been living under a great strain and that this was Nature's way of giving you a rest. You do feel better?"

"I feel quite well. Mevrouw, what happened at the funeral?"

Mevrouw van de Lijn had turned to the chair where her print dress, freshly laundered lay. She began to put it on.

"What happened, dear? Well, Mynheer Vosmar was buried, and then young Mynheer Vanderplasse brought my husband and the agent into the house and disclosed to them what Mynheer Vosmar had hidden all those years. It was a great shock, of course."

Nothing about an Englishman, a clove smuggler, being brought to justice.

Mevrouw, busy with the buttons of her bodice, turned around.

"Some people are inclined to be critical Mynheer Vosmar's behavior, but do yc know, I understand. If such a thing had ha pened to my little girl I might have acted th same way, if I had been able to. All the sam it was very wrong and heartless of him bring you here and involve you. You mu have had a horrible time. Thank God, I kno the man my daughter married. If I didn't should have gone mad, to think that suc things were possible."

"I want to see Nicolas," Julia said.

"He always looks in at about this time, whe he comes back from the plantation for brea fast. How fortunate it was that he was her all ready to take charge of everything." Sl had finished her dressing, and came to the be expertly she lifted Julia and pulled the pillov around to support her. "I'm a handy nurse she said. "I've had lots of practice."

She rustled away. Julia heard from the si ting room a few whispered words: "much be ter . . . almost herself . . . talk too much ! nothing to upset." What did that mean?

Nicolas came tiptoeing into the room.

In some way for which there was no a counting in physical terms, he had aged. Tl thick shining fair hair, the fresh complexio the clear gray eyes were just as they had bee but the stamp of authority and responsibility yes, and of a calf love outgrown—was on hi now, aging him by ten years.

He said, "Hullo, Julia. You really are fe ing better? You look almost like yoursel

"I look hideous," she said; "but never mi that. I have so many things to ask you." S dropped her voice. "Is Mevrouw van de L out there, Nicolas?" she asked.

"No, she tactfully cided to drink her tea the veranda."

"Nicolas, what ha pened? First of all, wh happened to Charles?"

"He went back to Ay had to hustle him off. couldn't keep him he with half Banda coming the funeral, could I? But he was fit to go a I know got back safely."

"How do you know that?"

"We arranged to use the old signals. There a tall tree on Ay and another on the tip Rua; through glasses they're visible, and wi flags of different colors—that's how it's done

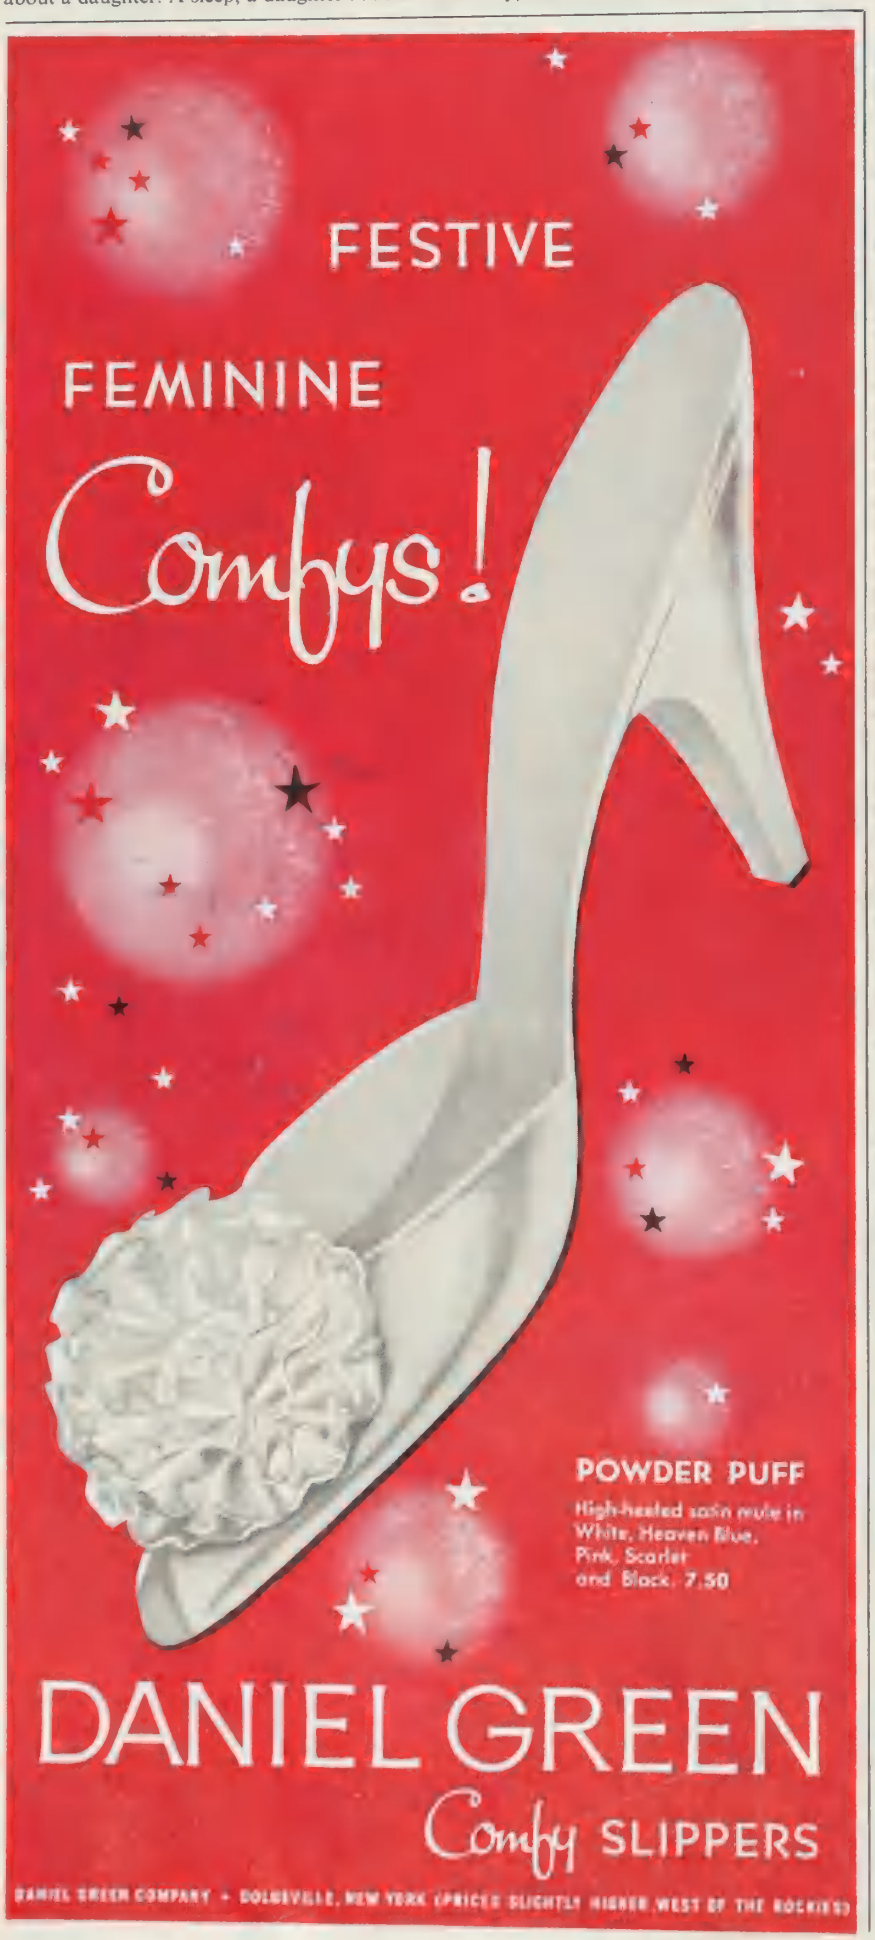
"And he got back safely, and nobody kno about him?"

"That is so."

She rested back against the pillows. "Nc tell me the rest. Where is Doctor Hootman

"You don't need to worry about hi Julia."

"I'm not worrying. I just want to kno There's a great gap in my mind. That do opened and there you stood, and I thoug 'He knows, now I can give up!' That's the l thing I can remember. Nicolas, please, go from there."



The look, half smile, half grimace, w which people acknowledge a comic element a situation not fundamentally amusing ca into Nicolas' face.

"Well, there I was, with the two of you f on the floor. I knew nothing; and I'd just se Pieter—I wasn't feeling too steady myse You remember, the moment we met, you s you had something to tell me, and I gathere from the way you stopped talking, that y didn't want Hootman to hear. Then you we off and I got to thinking . . . all that myste you know, and I thought I'd see for myself, I climbed the wall. . . . Julia, I am profound sorry for the way I used to talk to you abo Pieter. I'm sorry for the rest of my behavi too. As soon as I understood ——"

"Go on, finish the story."

"I stood there, not knowing why you h been locked in, or who the man was, or a thing. I knew where Uncle Simon kept brandy, so I got it, and went from one to t other of you in a dotty sort of way. It made difference to you, but it brought him rou He's—he's a good fellow, Julia. He got hi self up and pulled himself together and sa 'You're the cousin or something, aren't yo and in no time he'd explained everything, wh Hootman was up to, and why, and why y ere scared." He broke off and looked at the ale, sunken face on the pillow, with its violet-dded eyes. "Mevrouw van de Lijn said I houldn't talk too much, Julia. I'll tell you the st another time."

"Go on, go on," Julia said. "I want to hear all now. If you don't want to upset me you'll ll me everything, just as it happened."

"Charles said that Hootman was slightly azy and had a pistol and would be danger-us. So we made a plan to disarm him. When e heard him coming, Charles, whom he ex-ected to see, sat in a chair and held his head nd I got behind the door. He came in and s he turned to lock the door I pounced out nd took his pistol away. And that was the nd of that."

"But not the end of the story. Go on."

Nicolas' lips curled with distaste. "He went pieces. He dropped into a chair, put his ead in his hands and he . . . cried. I tried to e sorry for him, but I couldn't. Charles was. will say for the English they do love their nemies once they're disarmed! He got him me brandy. I tried to be generous, too, and id he could stay on and look after Pieter; hereupon he cried the harder."

"So then?"

"Then Charles lost his patience and got up nd gave him a shake, and said, 'You're a octor, do something for her!' Her being you. e said you'd come round in time. So Charles nd I carried you here and Juno put you to ed. Then we had a sound good supper; we lked about the signals and he went off."

"Do you know a signal asking him to come ere?"

"Of course. I'll run it up whenever you like."

"That's very kind."

"Just," he corrected her. "I remember that would have been much to his advantage to lay Hootman's game. And to yours."

She raised herself a little higher on the pil-ows. "Now tell me about Pieter."

"There's nothing to tell. He's there. That's l."

"Is he doing anything?"

"What is there for the poor thing to do?"

"Who is with him?"

"That great dumb Negro."

"Where is Doctor Hootman?"

"You don't have to worry about him, ulia."

"Is he dead?"

"Yes."

"Did he kill himself? I can see by your face. hat doesn't upset me. He's better dead. He'd ved all those years on hope. When that was ne, what had he to live for?"

"I offered to keep him on here," Nicolas id, not understanding. "And Charles offered take him to Ay. He said they were all gues and vagabonds there, and that a doc-r would be very welcome. Hootman said e'd accept, and went to get his things. He ad a pair to the pistol we'd taken from him, nd he shot himself. There, now you know verything."

And it had done her no harm; she looked etter, restored and lively.

"Thank you very much, Nicolas. Now you o and have your breakfast. I want mine. ould you come back in about an hour?"

"Of course. As soon as you feel well enough e must have a serious talk. But for the pres-nt I just want you to understand, Julia, that don't wish, in any way, to usurp your author-ty."

She said, "I'm very grateful to you for look-ng after things." And now it seemed quite afe and quite ordinary to say, "Dear Nicolas."

When he returned she was in the sitting oom, wearing a wrap and propped up in one f the long chairs from the veranda. On one de of her stood the clavichord, open, and on he other a table cleared of all its ornaments.

Julia cut short his protests at finding her out f bed. "I want you to fetch Pieter here to me. m too wobbly to walk, but he can come here nd I can amuse him. There's no reason now o keep him locked away. Bring all his stuff; cho knows where to find everything."

"Honestly, Julia, I think you're making an nnecessary exertion. He doesn't know one oom from another. And if he has stuff to do, hy doesn't he do it? I've never seen him do nything except sit."

"That's just it. Unless he's roused he'll sit there till he dies. His toys are his link with life—but there has to be somebody taking an interest. I understand all about it. Doctor Hootman has kept him alive for eight years."

"And now you're going to keep him alive?"

"To the last moment. Charles said it. When we come together we don't want to be haunted by thoughts of Pieter."

After what seemed a long time she heard their footsteps, Pieter's clumsy and shuffling. Then they were in the doorway, Nicolas holding Pieter by the arm.

Julia was appalled by the change. He looked twenty years older, there were even some white hairs among the dull dusty-brown ones; he had shrunk, and all his clothes were too big for him.

His dull, uncomprehending stare wandered about the strange room. Nicolas' face took on a what-did-I-tell-you-it-is-hopeless look, and he withdrew his arm. Behind them Echo loomed up, his arms piled with the bead boxes, the clay, the cane, the string.

Julia said, "Pieter. Good morning, Pieter. Come to Julie."

His dull stare swung round, focused and brightened.

"Julie," he cried, "Julie!" It was the voice of the lost one who has been found.

He lumbered over toward her and then, just short of her outstretched hand, stopped short, lowering his head and looking at her suspiciously out of the corners of his eyes. Something wrong. Something different.

"It's Julie," she said, in a steady, reassuring voice.

"Julie! Yes! Yes! Julie."

He gave his pathetic, wide-open smile and came forward. When he was near enough he lifted one of his limp red hands, slowly, awkwardly, as though it weighed very heavy. Tentatively, experimentally he laid it on her head. Then he said, with delight:

"Pretty! Pretty for Julie!" END measure. For evenings, I cover my hair on my way to parties—especially when I'm driving in an open car—by wearing a little organdy or chiffon hood which snaps or ties in a ribbon bow under my chin. "GETTING STARTED ON A DIET is what's difficult," says FELICIA FARR, brown-eyed beauty who prefers to keep her weight at 108 pounds, "because at that weight I look, feel and photograph my best. Between making movies, though, I relax, and the pounds creep on. Suddenly I discover I've added five or ten pounds, my face looks pudgy, my clothes are too tight and I feel f-a-t." Felicia has tried most of the conventional diet plans, "but they don't work for me for the simple reason that I cheat when I'm allowed three meals a day."

It wasn't until Felicia hit on her nothing-to-eat-after-three-P.M. idea that she has been able successfully to start a diet. "I limit this dieting to three or four days at a time during which I eat only breakfast and a late lunch each day. Both of these meals consist of what I normally eat. For instance, breakfast might be fresh fruit, Swiss cheese on toast, coffee with a little cream and one sugar. For luncheon, scrambled eggs and crisp bacon, salad, milk and a light dessert—custard or fruit gelatin. Or I might have a small steak or lamb chops at luncheon, along with salad, milk and dessert. Then nothing more to eat until the next day. (Well, maybe a glass of milk in the evening if I'm famished!) By not eating any solid food after three o'clock, I have the rest of the afternoon and evening to burn up calories and reduce weight. I've lost as much as five pounds in three days this way," Felicia says, "and by then I'm conditioned to the idea of eating less—so that I can start a regular diet without undue hardship. On this I go back to three meals a day, cutting down on amounts of bread, butter and sweets—but I don't feel that I'm really depriving myself. People ask what my doctor thinks about my unconventional reducing plan. He approves for a very good reason—my health continues to be excellent."

"WARM FRIENDLINESS AND A GRACIOUS MANNER—to me, those are the most appealing and rewarding qualities of beauty," says MARIA SCHELL, popular European actress who is in this country making her first American movie. "I can tell more about a woman by the clasp of her hand at an introduction and the sound of her voice when she greets you than by her appearance or the clothes she wears. I get great pleasure out of receiving people in good will, believing sincerely that I will like them and want to get to know them—therefore I am always particularly charmed when someone extends that same sincerity to me. The ability to give and receive friendship is a real badge of beauty. I would much rather spend thirty minutes at a party getting to know one or two people than spend the whole evening drifting aimlessly from one group to the next. Listening to people, truly listening and caring about what others have to say is a simple, lovely courtesy. (Have you ever been asked, 'How are you?'—and before you have a chance to answer, the person is launching into a discussion of how she feels? When this happens to me, I say to myself, 'Maria, don't talk—they don't care.')

"I know it isn't easy in our high-speed way of life to always remember or to take the time to be gracious and thoughtful. Sometimes, I set aside ten minutes of the day for the sheer purpose of not thinking. I close my mind to every concern or worry or rush thing I have to do and I r-e-l-a-x. How peaceful and quiet everything becomes. When I awaken from this soothing little interlude, I feel refreshed and able to face the rest of my day with serenity and renewed spirit."

Maria Schell will appear in "The Brothers Karamazov"

"A TINY FIGURE HAS ITS DRAWBACKS," says PIER ANGELI, who is 5'2" tall, weighs 105 pounds, has a 20" waist and wears a size 5 or 7 dress. The only thing "big" about Pier is her engaging smile which adds sparkling warmth to her spritelike beauty. "I adore pretty clothes," she says, "but I believe girls my size have to be especially careful not to choose things that are too overpowering. Big hats, wide belts, long-torso dresses and boxy suits may look divine on tall figures, but they shrink short girls—cut us in two." Pier believes another all-wrong choice for a tiny figure is the combination of full, full skirts worn with flat, flat shoes. "They make a small girl look as though she's waddling instead of walking. I save my ballet-type shoes to wear at home with tapered slacks. When I wear full skirts I don't overdo the petticoats, and wear them with simple, high-heeled pumps." In choosing a suit, Pier keeps an eye out for jackets fitting neatly through the shoulders and body line combined with straight skirts. "In Italy, we call it the 'imbuto' look—slim, tapered, delicate." Pier's concentration on selecting the right clothes for her size extends to her choice of purses—small and oblong in shape, rather than the big, pouchy handbags. She scales necklines to her size, too, avoiding fluffy, frilly collars ("I get lost in them") and wearing, instead, Peter Pan collars, sweaters with little flat fur collars, or, for afternoon or evening, simple sheath-cut lines or scoop shapes. A single strand of lovely pearls and tiny pearl-and-diamond earrings are gifts to Pier from her husband, Vic Damone, and her favorite choice in jewelry. One final and wonderful aspect about Pier's appearance has nothing to do with her size. From the top of her shining head to the tip of her polished shoes, she has a pristinely immaculate look which is a beauty joy to behold!

Pier Angeli will appear in "Merry Andrew"

"AT LAST I CAN RELAX, FEEL WELL AND BE MYSELF!" says red-haired, blue-eyed SUZY PARKER, fashion model turned movie star. As a model, Suzy had to keep her weight down to 110 pounds ("I'm 5'8" tall but designers and photographers didn't think I looked 'fashiony' unless my bones showed"), she had to load her face with make-up ("Nobody wanted my freckles to show") and live on her nerves ("A busy model doesn't have time for meals—she's lucky to get a bite of apple or sip of coffee between fittings and photographs").

Now Suzy's changed all that and, as you can see by her picture, no glamour has been lost in the process. "In the three months I've been out here, I've gained almost fifteen pounds, and I want to add five more. I haven't had to stuff myself with food either—I just make a point of eating each meal slowly, and in a relaxed and pleasant atmosphere. While I'm gaining, I keep my figure firm by exercising. I love to walk miles every day—and I swim and ski whenever I get a chance. The year-round exercise combined with healthier eating is getting my figure in the shape I want it to be!"

As for the freckles—"I don't purposely point my face to the sun to get them," says Suzy, "but on the other hand I was born with the kind of fair skin that freckles and I see no reason to hide the fact. Really, I think they're rather pretty." The use of less make-up (even when she's making a picture) gives Suzy's skin a better chance to remain fresh and youthful looking, and "at night it's much easier to give it a scrupulous cleaning and keep it free from clogging pores and blackheads." Once a week Suzy gives herself a creamy-mask treatment to clear and brighten her skin. She smooths the creamy preparation over her face and neck, relaxes while it firms (about ten minutes) and then rinses it off with cool water. "A good way to wake up your appearance before an important appointment—or a special date."

Suzy Parker is appearing in "Kiss Them for Me"

"IT TAKES THE CLEVER USE OF MAKE-UP to bring warmth and definite personality to a monotone blonde's appearance," says pretty Barbara Lang. "It seems to me blondes have the double task of trying successfully to enhance their pale coloring without risking the possibility of looking too made up." Here is Barbara's favorite routine: Each morning she freshens up by lightly "spanking" a chilled liquid skin tonic into her face and neck. After patting this dry, she smooths on some colorless moisturizing lotion to serve as an all-day skin softener. Into this she blends the sheerest film of make-up foundation tinted a pink beige. "It has to seem to disappear into my skin before I'm satisfied that I'm not wearing too much," says Barbara. Next she uses a brown eyebrow pencil ("A soft-point pencil is easiest to use") to sketch color and shape for her eyebrows. Using little outward strokes she follows the natural line of her eyebrow, adding emphasis to the center arch. To bring depth of color and apparent thickness to pale eyelashes, Barbara uses black mascara, stroking it on the underneath side of the upper lashes ("Color on the lower lashes looks too artificial"). Her geranium-pink lipstick is applied with a lip brush, and Barbara adds needed fullness to her upper lip by following the natural line, but going beyond it ever so slightly. ("I avoid drawing a curve where Nature hasn't put one.") A light dusting of powder completes Barbara's daytime make-up. For evening she uses a soft violet eye shadow and a touch of cream rouge to give a pretty glow to her face. "I take more time subduing the effect of my make-up than I do in applying it," says Barbara, "but it pays off by creating a fresh, natural look."

mother. Teresa spoiled her mother, as everybody did; sometimes she laughed at her—but the laughter was gentle. It was proof enough; proof of what, Neville would have found it hard to say—but in his eyes now, as he watched Lady Thurloe making her farewells, there was not the touch of cynicism that had once shown in them when he looked at her.

She was in the car; all but the last good-bys had been said. There came out of the front door a woman brandishing a hatbox.

"Wait—wait!" she shouted.

She came awkwardly down the steps—short, gray-haired, plain to ugliness. Lolly Hyde was a distant cousin of Teresa's father. She had come some twenty years ago, at his request, to join the household. She was then nearing forty, but between her and Teresa there had sprung into being a mutual trust and affection which nothing had ever shaken. Between her and Coralie Thurloe was a link stronger than affection: Coralie needed her. Coralie needed a house that ran without her aid; Coralie needed freedom to pursue her own interests and amusements; above all, she needed someone who knew what she wanted and who would see that she got it if possible—and all this Lolly Hyde provided.

Lolly handed over the case."Found it on the landing. Boat trains don't wait. Enjoy yourself and keep warm and enjoy the scenery. Good-by. See you in two weeks."

Lady Thurloe raised a hand in a last farewell, leaned back and was borne from sight.

Lolly tucked a few whispy trails of hair into the bun at the back of her head. "Well, she's off now and I hope she'll enjoy herself. You out to lunch, Teresa, or in?"

"Out. I'm having lunch with Lawrence."

"You sure he's going to give you lunch?" Lolly asked. "What about that sour housekeeper of his? Won't she give notice?"

"I'll let you know when I come back," promised Teresa, and watched Lolly go with her awkward, rolling gait into the house.

"You didn't tell me you were lunching with your godfather," said Neville.

"I rang him up this morning and asked if I could," said Teresa. "I've got things to talk over with him."

"Such as?"

"Such as what we're going to do about mother when we get married," she said slowly.

His expression was bewildered. "Is there a problem?"

"Yes. Lolly's leaving."

"Why would she leave? Where would she go?"

"I can't imagine her anywhere but here—but that isn't the point. You see, Neville, this means that mother will be alone."

"Except for a gardener and a chauffeur and a maid, to say nothing of the daily woman or women," he said dryly. "Don't get things out of proportion. Your mother's a very lucky woman."

"I know. But when you and I arranged to marry in September, we both thought that Lolly'd be here to—to ——"

"Close the gap? When did she tell your mother that she was going?"

"She hasn't told mother yet. She told me—last night."

"Was this what you were going in to see Lawrence about?"

"Yes. What I want to talk to him about is"—she brought out the name a little unwillingly—"my Uncle Hubert."

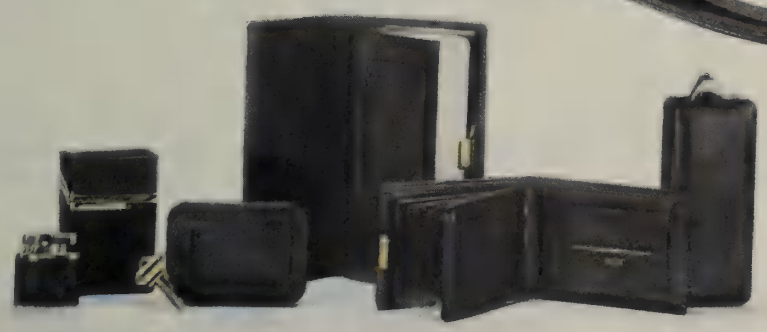
"Why drag Hubert out now? Twenty-two years is a long quarrel. You think he and your mother would make it up?"

"Quarrels have been made up after longer intervals than that."

"What was the row about?"

"I've never been able to find out. Mother did hint once—before changing the subject—that the quarrel was in some way concerned with his wife, or his marriage. But if his wife is dead ——"

"So you're going into Brighton to get some facts out of your godfather?"



"If I can. He and my father were friends long before my father married. Lawrence will know about the row, and what caused it."

"All right. So you lunch with old Lawrence and fix up this reconciliation between your mother and the brother she hasn't seen for twenty-two years. Then you bring your Uncle Hubert down here to live with your mother, to fill the gap made by your marriage and Lolly's departure. Correct?"

"It might sound a silly plan," said Teresa, "but there's no harm in trying, is there?"

"Well, go and see Lawrence. He's a sensible fellow; he'll tell you that what's past is past, and is, as a rule, better left alone. And now I've got to go."

Lolly glanced up as Teresa came in. "Neville gone?"

"Yes. Can I talk to you, Lolly, for a minute?"

"H'm?"

Teresa studied her—and suddenly, for the first time, tried to imagine the house without her. From the beginning there had been Lolly. Lolly in the nursery, on walks, at meals; Lolly in times of trouble or perplexity, Lolly in times of sickness. And now Lolly was going—where? And she, Teresa, was also going—where? One had to marry; one wanted, in a way, to marry, but at this moment—Teresa faced the truth and acknowledged it with a sinking feeling—at this moment, marriage and a new home were merely names, merely prospects, not alluring ones.

"Don't go, Lolly," she begged impulsively.

Lolly turned herself round in her chair to face Teresa squarely. "'Don't go,'" she repeated. "Well, why? Why, don't go?"

"Because of mother."

"Yes, yes, yes, I know," said Lolly; "she couldn't live without me, life when I leave her will be insupportable and so on and so on. Your father wrote to me exactly twenty-three years and four months ago and said, 'Lily, you've no money and no home but you're fond of children and I'd rather trust you with this new Teresa of ours than half a dozen of these so-called nannies. Come and try it,' he said. So I came to keep an eye on you and I've stayed to keep an eye on you. But now you're going out into the world, and Neville will take on where I'm leaving off. So I'm free."

"But mother ——"

"Your mother, at this moment, relies on you for company. If I stay, she'll begin to rely on me—and once that happens, I shall never get away, because once your mother wants anything, she ——"

Lolly checked herself abruptly; her next words were spoken without looking up:

"Hadn't you better get off if you're lunching with Lawrence?"

"There's something I want to tell you first. When you told me you were going, I got frightened about leaving mother alone, and I suddenly thought of someone who might . . . well, come and live with her."

"Which someone?" asked Lolly in surprise. "Lawrence won't give up his house, if that's what you're after. It's big and cold and uncomfortable—but he won't leave it."

"Not Lawrence. I was thinking of mother's brother, Uncle Hubert."

Lolly raised her eyes to Teresa's. "You won't get Hubert either," she said slowly. "So you can put that out of your head."

Teresa leaned forward. "Lolly, what did they quarrel about?"

Lolly rose and began to clear the table. "Money, mostly," she said. "But it was a grand quarrel; it wasn't one of those holes that you can put a patch over. It was a split like the Grand Canyon—that wide, and that deep."

"Does anybody know where Uncle Hubert is living?"

"They know where he was living in the house in London."

"Which house in London?"

"The house he and your mother lived in all their lives. Your mother's the person to go to for information."

"On the few occasions on which I've mentioned Uncle Hubert's name, mother's gone quite pale and —— "

"—— and said, 'Never let that name be spoken in my presence.' Or something. Well, yes; it was quite a quarrel," said Lolly. "And you'd do much better to put it right out of your mind."

"It's absurd to have mother living alone here and her only brother—her only relation—living alone somewhere else. If someone tells me that Uncle Hubert isn't a widower, that he doesn't want to see mother and that he wouldn't dream of making up the quarrel, then I'll drop the whole thing."

"Go and ask Lawrence—and if you're going, you'd better go soon. If you keep that housekeeper of his waiting for lunch—even a cold lunch—she'll take it out of him."

Teresa went slowly to the door. "Why doesn't he get rid of her?"

"Because he's like all men, terrified that he won't get anybody else to look after him. Tell him from me he's a fool."

Teresa felt under no necessity to deliver this message. She kissed the old man when he let her in, and followed him to the study. It was a man's room, thought Teresa; a room with an accumulation of books and papers and letters, the desk littered, the two large hide-covered chairs shabby and worn.

"Looks untidy," said old Sir Lawrence, turning and following her glance. He poured out two glasses of sherry, gave Teresa hers and then lowered himself carefully into a chair. "Everybody's always told me that I was a fool to go on living in a big place like this after m'wife died, but I'm glad I didn't move out. Mrs. Crofts is a sour old witch, but I suppose I'm lucky to have her. Drink up that sherry and I'll get you another."

"Not yet, thank you. Lawrence ——"

"Ah. Now it's coming," he said.

"What's coming?"

"Whatever it was you came to see me about."

"It's about Uncle Hubert."

"About ——" Sheer surprise stopped Sir Lawrence. "Hubert? What in the world put him into your head?"

"Lolly's leaving the cottage when I marry."

"Well, I suppose that's no surprise, in a way. She's always considered herself there chiefly on your behalf. With you out of the house, I don't think it's surprising that she should want to make a change. If she doesn't make it now, she'll never make it."

"That's what she says."

"And what has all that got to do with your Uncle Hubert?"

"Just —— What was the quarrel about, Lawrence?" Teresa broke off to ask.

Her godfather sat looking at her unhappily. "No point in digging up all that old history, is there?"

"I don't know. But if mother's to be alone, why can't Uncle Hubert come and live with her?"

"He's got a wife—or he had."

"Hasn't anybody heard of them all this time—twenty-two years?"

"Well, I haven't, and I don't suppose your mother has either. If you want news of him you'd have to go and see Walter Creed or his brother Hilary."

"Are they his lawyers as well as mother's and mine?"

"Of course. They administer the trust. They pay him his income. They'd know where your uncle was and whether his wife was still alive or not. But why this worry about your mother's future? She's got the most comfortable home in all Sussex, she's got servants and she's got plenty of money. When you've gone and Lolly's gone, she'll look round, find herself a congenial companion and charm her into going to live with her. What your mother wants—your mother will —— Look, drink up that sherry and we'll have lunch."

"Lolly said they quarreled about money. Why? There couldn't have been a shortage."

Sir Lawrence leaned back. "Well . . . it was this way. Your mother and her brother inherited a fairly large house in London, and a comfortable income. Your grandfather left all his money in trust; your mother and Hubert couldn't touch the capital. When it comes to you, there won't be any strings and you'll be able to do as you like with it—but your mother and Hubert could only use the income and the income wasn't left to them equally. Your grandfather considered that a man can always make a living for himself, but not a woman. So your mother got eight hundred a year—and Hubert got four hundred a year and what he'd earn, presumably, in a job. But he preferred to live without a job; in those days twelve hundred a year—their pooled income—wasn't a princely sum, but it was a comfortable one."

"Then mother married?"

"Yes. Your mother married; she married a rich man, and Hubert seemed to feel that she'd let him go on using her share of the money and save him from having to find a job. But your mother had other ideas."

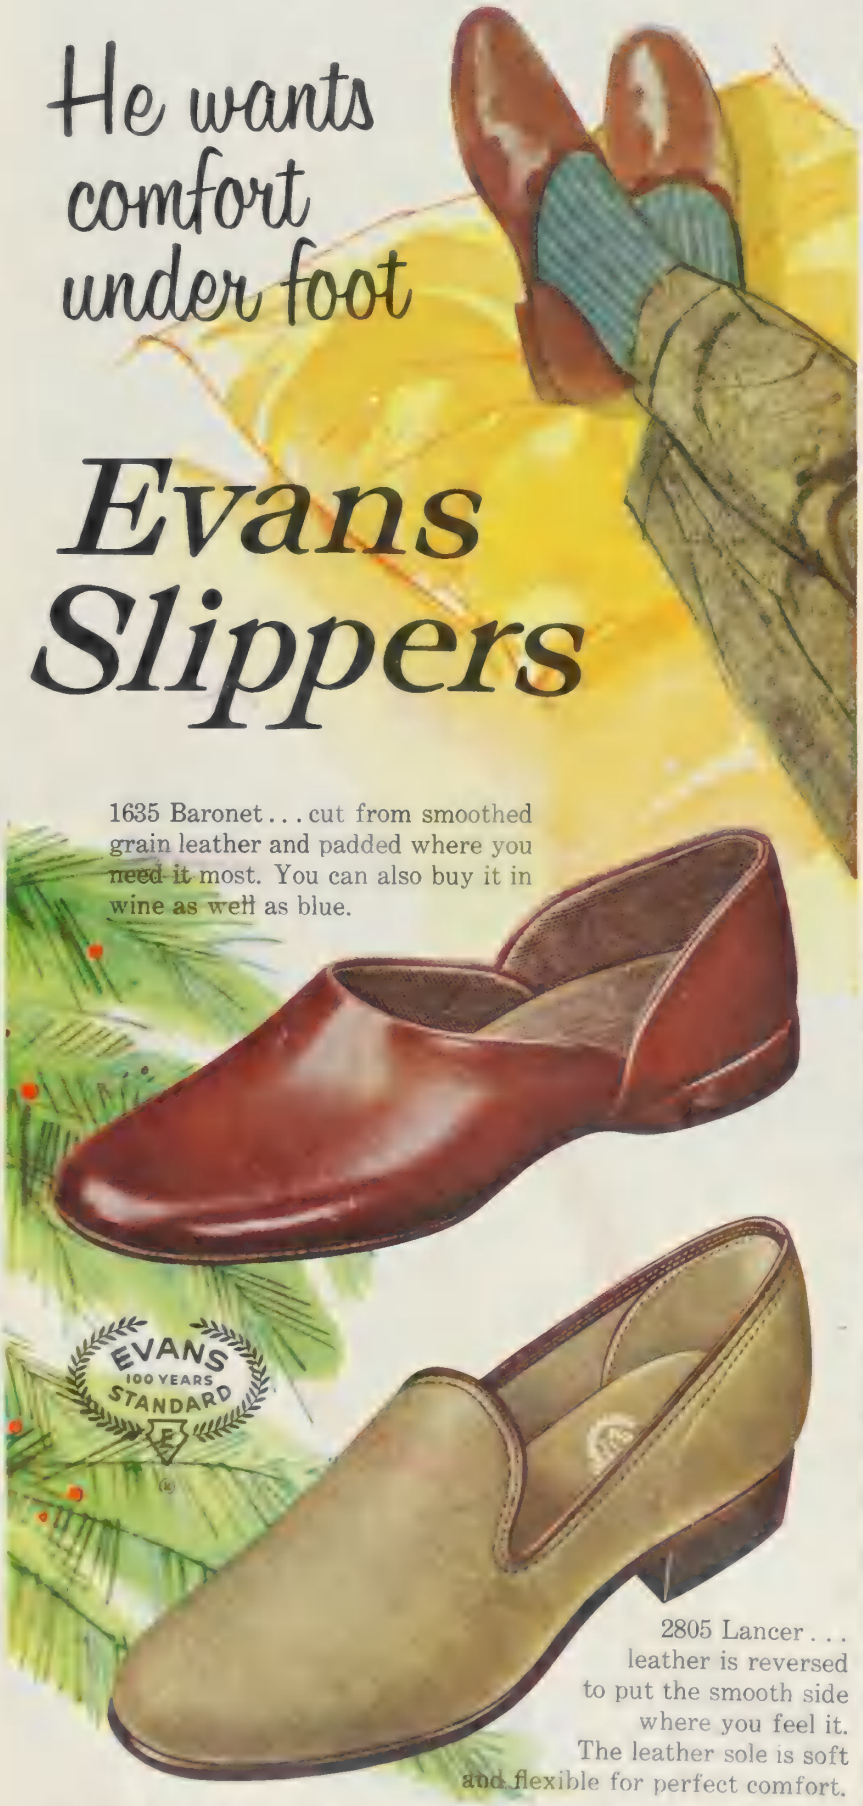
"That doesn't sound like mother. She's very generous."

"I'm glad to hear you say so—but then, neither you nor I have ever tried to persuade her to part with several hundred pounds a year. Hubert began by asking and then he began demanding. But he was wasting his time."

"She refused? And then they quarreled?"

"Well"—Sir Lawrence hesitated—"it wasn't only that. You see, Hubert did something—in pique, or perhaps merely with a view to his own future comfort—which ruled him out for ever as far as your mother was concerned."

"He stole?" prompted Teresa. "He embezzled? He forged?"



"No, no, no." Sir Lawrence turned. "He married a—a woman he'd been living with."

"A mistress?"

"Yes. I dare say if she'd been merely his mistress, it might have been all right. But she happened to be his cook too. Your mother'd probably have been able to swallow one or the other, but the two together stuck in her throat. And . . . there was a row. An almighty row.

"It doesn't seem much," said Teresa slowly, "to have an almighty row about."

"No. But don't get out of period," Sir Lawrence reminded her. "Today we look back at a fellow who married his cook and feel he was a man of vision. But twenty years ago, people had somewhat different ideas about cooks and about mistresses."

"But if she's dead ——"

"Cooks never die. But if you want news of them, you'll have to ask Walter Creed; he pays Hubert's income and he'll know all about him and his affairs. If you take my advice, you'll forget all about Hubert. And now come and have some lunch." He held out a hand to Teresa. "It's all on the table here: cold chicken, cold ham and the bare bones of a salad. Will you mix the dressing?"

"Yes." Teresa took the bowl, but her gaze remained on the old man's leathery cheeks. "This morning . . . it's odd," she said, "but this morning I know for certain something that I've suspected for a long time. You and mother—you've never been quite ——"

"Your mother and I are the best of friends."

"Good friends, yes. But . . . were you involved in this quarrel long ago?"

"I happened to be at the cottage when the top blew off everything—but that was all. Mere spectator. What you've felt, probably, since you grew up, is that there's a sort of minor conflict between your mother and myself. Well, the conflict is . . . yourself. You see, it wasn't your mother who made me your godfather; it was your father. I always felt that you were—what's that silly phrase?—a sacred charge, and so everything your mother has arranged for you has been screened by me through my desire to see that it's something your father would have approved of. Mostly it was; when it wasn't, I've gone to your mother and said so, frankly and with a lamentable lack of tact. And she hasn't liked it. The situation doesn't make for one of warm friendliness. Does that satisfy you?"

She smiled. "Yes, thank you," she said.

They sat down to eat. Teresa said nothing more about her uncle until the coffee was bubbling and they were back in their deep chairs. Then she raised the subject again.

"Where's the house?" she asked.

"It's in Grosvenor Drive. Number Fifty-four. It used to be a good address, but I don't know what the district is like now. If I were you, Teresa, my dear, I'd let the whole thing alone."

Teresa spent a restless night. She tried to picture Uncle Hubert with her mother as they had been when they were young, living together in the house in London. It was impossible, however, to imagine her mother anywhere but at Folly Cottage. Most difficult of all was to imagine her mother quarreling violently.

Sir Lawrence had advised her against going to Grosvenor Drive; Lolly thought the scheme ill advised. But curiosity, Teresa found in the morning, was stronger than reason, and she rose resolved to go. She timed her journey carefully; if she got to the house just after tea, there would be a good chance of finding somebody at home. She got to London, after all, later than she had intended; it was almost half past five when the train got in. She took a bus part of the way to Grosvenor Drive and walked the rest of the way.

The district was in process of being turned into a business sector. New office buildings stood between old Victorian houses; there were large gaps here and there with builders' signs displayed upon them. Crossing the street, Teresa saw that Nos. 46 to 50 had been swallowed up by the offices of an insurance company. No. 52 was hidden behind scaffolding.

She came to No. 54 and, stopping, let her eyes roam as casually as possible over the house. It was solidly built, square, ugly; five steps led up to the front door, and a few yards away were more steps, leading to the basement. At every window hung straight curtains screening the interior of the rooms. The curtains, she noted, were fresh, the steps newly washed, the little yard below clean and uncluttered; having taken in these details, she found that they added nothing whatsoever to her hazy ideas about her uncle.

Doubts as to the wisdom of what she was doing came to her for the first time. Dreams dissolved fast in this atmosphere of solid reality, of grimy buildings and scaffolding and the hammering of workmen. Her normal good sense told her that if she had gone instead to the offices of Creed and Creed, either of the brothers—Walter or Hilary—would have been able to supply her with more information than the blank façade of the house at which she was gazing.

She turned to go, but it was too late. A man had come down the street and had begun to mount the steps leading to the front door—and then he paused and came down again. Teresa saw that he was tall and rather thin, with a face whose plainness was redeemed by a pair of well-set, intelligent gray eyes. He looked about thirty.

He addressed her somewhat hesitatingly. "You're . . . looking for somebody?"

"No." Teresa spoke hurriedly. "No, thank you. I'm not."

Half turning, he let his gaze roam over the house, as she had been doing when he first saw her. His meaning was clear: there was nothing about it to cause a passer-by to stop and gaze at it for so long. Teresa felt herself coloring.

"I knew somebody who lived here—a very long time ago," she said. "Ages ago."

A smile twitched his mouth and lit the gray eyes. "Ages?" His tone was quizzical. "Not more, shall we say, than twenty-two . . . twenty-four years?" She made no answer, and his tone became more formal. "The house belongs to a Mr. Hubert Towers."

"Yes, I know," said Teresa.

"You know him?"

"I . . . no." She turned to go. "I was just . . . looking at the house. Good-by."

He gave a slight bow. "There's a taxi rank at the corner—may I call a taxi for you?" he asked.

Teresa, about to refuse, found herself, instead, walking beside him; he adjusted his long strides to her shorter steps, and for some moments they proceeded in silence. Then he halted.

"It's just struck me," he said. "Mr. Towers isn't in England at the moment, but his wife is here, and if you wanted to see her ——"

"No," she said. "It's very kind of you to tell me, but I—I'll come back at some other time."

"Mrs. Towers," said her companion, "will be sorry to have missed you. May I tell her that you'll be calling again?"

Teresa glanced at him swiftly; his eyes, frankly curious, speculative, held hers.

"My name is Tudor; Mark Tudor," he said. "I can tell you anything you want to know about the house. I happen to live there."

Surprise brought Teresa to a halt once more; for a wild moment she had an idea that her uncle might have had a son and that she might be confronting an unknown cousin. Her momentary interest, frank and open, brought a smile to his lips.

"Sometimes," he said slowly, "impulses are odd things. You had an impulse—am I right?—to visit the house."

"I . . . yes, I did."

"You came looking for something, or somebody," he said, "and you're going away without finding out anything at all."

"I thought better of it," she said. "And now will you call me a taxi?"

"Surely." He signaled. "Before you go, why don't you try to find out from me, if I can help you, anything you came to learn?"

"There's nothing you can tell me, thank you, Mr. Tudor."

"There's a good deal. I live in the top flat, and there are other tenants—but you didn't come to see them."

"How do you know?"

"In Mr. Towers' room there's a photograph of a woman—a girl; it was taken about twenty years ago. His wife told me that it was a photograph of Mr. Towers' sister. His sister—she also told me—had a daughter."

He stopped, but his smile was wide and so infectious that Teresa smiled in sympathy.

"All right," she said. "Mr. Towers is my uncle. And now may I go away?"

"Most certainly." He opened the door of the taxi. "But it's a pity, don't you think?" He handed her in and paused. "I want to beg you, next time you stand before a door, to push it open and glance inside. You see if you don't look, you don't . . . find out, do you? Good-by."

His last words were soft, almost gentle. The taxi was moving, the driver sliding the partition open to hear her directions.

"Victoria Station," ordered Teresa with a curious feeling of flatness. Over. It was over. In the house she had left behind her, her uncle lived with his wife and a number of tenants—and she knew nothing of any of them. Her uncle would return from his journeying and rejoin his wife and she would never meet them or learn what they were like.

This course, which had seemed wise and sensible when she had decided upon it, looked now, after her meeting with the man called Mark Tudor, slightly shabby. She was running away, and he had guessed it—and thought her a coward.

She drew a deep breath and, leaning forward, tapped the glass partition. The driver opened it and inclined his head.

"Yes, miss?"

"Will you turn back, please?"

The partition shut with a bang. Teresa sat back and felt a curious sense of relief. They came to the corner at which she had got into the taxi. "Number Fifty-four, please."

The taxi drew up and she stepped out and paid the driver. Then she turned to mount the steps—and came to an abrupt halt. On the bottom step, leaning negligently against the stone balustrade, his attitude one of calm expectation, was Mark Tudor.

"If I'd been a man of tact," he remarked conversationally, "I would have gone into the house and peered out from behind a curtain, waiting for you to come back."

"You were so certain that I would?"

He smiled down at her in warm friendship. "You looked so intelligent. And you were, after all, a woman, and curiosity had brought you here. You began to have doubts—a word from a stranger can sometimes resolve doubts. And you came back, and I'm glad."

He ushered her into a small outer hall and through it into a large inner one. Teresa saw that it was rather dark, and bare of furniture. There was a strong smell of cooking and from below came the sound of singing—a woman's voice. From above came the sound of hammering, of a violin, of a sewing machine whirring steadily—and of castanets playing a swift, expert, rhythmic rattle of sound. She had barely time to take in these impressions—and then Mark Tudor had followed her in and closed the door sharply behind him.

And at its closing, all sounds ceased so suddenly that Teresa was left wondering whether she had imagined them. Then footsteps sounded on the stairs. A door off the hall opened and a woman stood for a moment in the doorway.

Teresa saw before her a woman of about fifty, tall, with gray hair worn in plaits over her head. Her skin was smooth and dark, her eyes almost black; she was dressed in shabby clothes and wore an apron over her dress. Her hands were rough and work-stained. Teresa, staring at her in amazement that she could not conceal, understood for the first time how little she had been told of the past. Nobody had told her that her uncle's wife was a foreigner; nobody had prepared her for this look of calm strength, this quiet air of dignity.

"But my goodness in heaven!" came softly from the woman. "You are so like—yes, so like your mother. You are Lady Thurloe's daughter—isn't it so? It is Teresa, not?"

She held out both her hands and took Teresa's in a brief clasp. "Why have you come? Why have you come so suddenly like this? Your father is dead, I know that—but where is your mother? Is she well? It is so unexpected, so extraordinary that you should be here. Your uncle will be pleased that you have come—but he is not here, you know. He travels here, there, everywhere—all the time. But how is it that you know Mark?"

"We met outside," said Mark. "She was looking for you, and I brought her inside."

"You were looking for me? I am glad; often I have wished to see you, to know how you looked. Your mother is well, and Miss Hyde?"

"Yes, thank you, madame."

"Ah—not madame! You must call me Zoe, which is my name. Yes, that will be better. Come"—she took Teresa's arm and led her across the hall—"we shall go to my room and we shall talk there. Come, Mark. But wait! First I shall have to arrange that the dinner does not spoil." She went to the foot of the stairs and shouted, "Maxie! Maxie, come down; here is a lady you should see."

Over the railing of the landing there appeared cautiously the head of an old man with snow-white hair and whiskers. From behind his shoulder peered an old woman. They glanced down—and vanished. From the floor above there showed for an instant the face of a young girl, startlingly beautiful—and then it, too, was withdrawn. Then a man came down the stairs; he was short and sturdy, middle-aged. Teresa saw that one of his arms was amputated above the elbow.

"This is Maxie," said Zoe, as he reached the hall. "He stays here and he works for us. Maxie, have you guessed who this lady is?"

Maxie gave a stiff little bow. "I have guessed. She is the niece of Mr. Towers."

His English, like Zoe's, was fluent, but his accent was thick. Before he could say more, Zoe had waved him to the door leading to the kitchen. "The food, Maxie—please look after it while I am talking to Miss Thurloe." She took Teresa's arm. "Come; come, Mark. We shall go into my room."

They seated themselves and Zoe broke into rapid speech. "It is so strange that you come so suddenly like this—and I know so little about you! Why did you come? Of course, to see your uncle—but it is long, no? Did your mother send you?"

"No. I—I just came," said Teresa.

"Because you had curiosity about your uncle?" Zoe's questions were friendly, but frank. "So your mother does not know that you have come?"

"No. She—as a matter of fact, she's away."

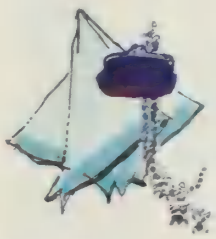
"Ah." Zoe's voice was expressionless. "She would not like you to come, I think?"

"I don't know."

Teresa felt that her replies were scarcely satisfactory, but it was impossible to explain that she had come hoping to find that her uncle was a widower. She wondered at her stupidity; she had never seen anyone quite so alive as the woman seated in the chair opposite to hers.

"I am sorry that you should miss your uncle. But he travels, as I told you," said Zoe. "He will come, he will be here for one month, two months, three—and then I will see that he is getting restless. He packs, he is off. France, Spain, Portugal; now it is Portugal, and he writes from Lisbon—but he does not say when he will come home. When he comes, will you like me to write to you?"

"That would be very kind," said Teresa.



She waited for more questions—but her aunt obviously considered the interview at an end. She had come to see her uncle. Her uncle was away. Her aunt would advise her when he returned.

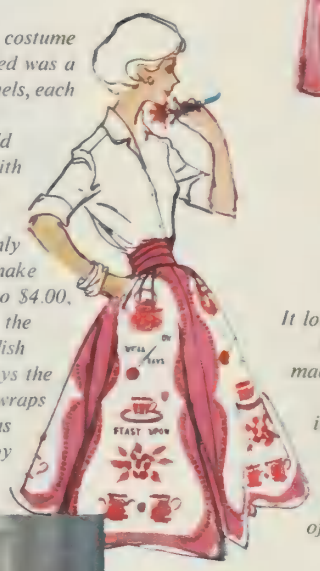
At home for Christmas

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!



Happy holidays and the excitement of Christmas are uppermost in Barbara J.'s mind. With a winter wardrobe complete, she decides now is the season for "at home" casuals—those comfortable and irresistible separates she loves to make as well as buy ready-made. This month, Barbara splurges on fashion—but not on fashion $'s. She makes her separates, a bright blouse and wool slacks, the two for less than $12.00. With her minimum of expenditure now as well as last month ($12.95 for her lace party dress), she has plenty of her wardrobe $'s left over for gifts. These are mostly accessories—some of the prettiest gifts of all. By BET HART

A clutch bag of blue velveteen, large enough for evening, small enough for an elegant change purse for daytime, $1.00. A square of turquoise silk chiffon, banded in a slightly deeper shade, $2.00. Beads in tones of blues, $2.95. And tiny jeweled butterfly earrings in mauve, $2.00.

Wrapping is most of the fun. Caning makes an especially pretty package, a very mysterious one too . . . Barbara adds the ribbon and holly. The contents? The brightest slippers imaginable, like the ones Barbara is wearing with her slacks, $3.95.

One "at home" costume Barbara considered was a skirt of four panels, each panel a dish towel. It would be pretty with a white shirt with roll-up sleeves, and only $2.95. She does make the skirt ($2.00 to $4.00, depending upon the elegance of the dish towels) and buys the blouse. But—she wraps them for Christmas giving. Blouse by John Netzky.

SKETCHES BY MARIBETH

Barbara contemplates a bright corduroy robe. It looks glamorous, but takes heartily to machine washings. For an evening at home, it could be worn with a pretty ribbon sash. The price, $7.95. Barbara decides in favor of the slacks. (Secretly hopes to find this under the tree.)

PRIGENT

At home, Barbara wears her slacks, Vogue Design No. 8908, and overblouse, Vogue "Very Easy-to-Make" No. 9380. The blouse, of three main pieces, goes together fast enough for an amateur to make in an evening and pretty enough for Christmas giving, especially in a bright velveteen. The gold chain is Barbara's accessory investment, and another gift idea: $1.00 for a strand long enough to wind around several times.*

Her separates are practical as they are pretty. Barbara can wear the slacks with her white jersey blouse from September. Her other special plan is to wear them with her blue Orlon sweater. Her scarf folded under the collar and tied to the front gives it an especially elegant air.

Mark Tudor spoke quickly. "Oh—but u're not going?" he exclaimed. "Zoe, don't her go. She hasn't seen Paloma, or the ron, or the baronne."

"How shall she be interested in those?" Zoe owned. "She does not know them."

"All the same, Paloma's worth looking ," said Mark.

Zoe's expression softened. "That is true," e said. "It is true, Teresa. Would you be- ve, she is even more beautiful than you. She Maxie's daughter. Wait, I will call her." e went out of the room and once more outed up the stairs. "Paloma! Come down- airs! Here is somebody for you to meet!"

From above, the castanets sounded briefly t angrily. As clearly as if they had spoken, ose downstairs understood that Paloma did t wish to come and meet the visitor.

"Mais oui!" begged Zoe. "Come, Paloma." Clatter, clack. No, I won't.

"She is my niece. Her name is Teresa," outed Zoe. "Come!"

Ripple, clatter, clack. Tell her to go to blazes.

"Paloma, you are very wicked. Come, come d talk to us."

The answer was a cascade of sound, bril- ntly executed, but so sustained that further change was impossible.

Mark looked at Teresa, a slow grin over- reading his face. "No Paloma," he said. ity." And then, as Teresa said nothing, he ded, "I hope you'll come back. But I don't ink you're going to—am I right?"

Teresa hesitated. Zoe was coming back— t she was not coming alone. Teresa took the nd of the small, frail, white-haired old lady o accompanied her aunt, and listened to a very voice speaking in French.

"I have known your uncle for many, many ars. He stayed in our home in France. You ve been to France?"

"Yes, madame."

"I should like to see France again. But w," said the old lady, "this is our home, and ur aunt looks after us very well."

"But it is not like old times, eh?" put in Zoe.

"No." The baronne smiled. "But you are od to us. Very, very good to us."

"That is nonsense. And now I shall take u up the stairs. Come."

She led her out, and Teresa heard Mark's ice close beside her. "She takes in sewing. d her husband plays the violin every night a French restaurant. He doesn't play ll—but the proprietor knew him in the old ys, and so he gives him a job. They're oke, poor old things."

"The baron and his wife?" asked Teresa.

"Yes. I thought when I came here that the le was bogus, but it's genuine. They wouldn't e it unless they had to. If the old man could lly play the violin, for example—but he n't, and so he gets by playing half on his olin and half on his title."

Zoe, returning, looked at Teresa and emed to speak with an effort. "You will stay dine with us?"

"No, thank you," said Teresa. "It's very d of you, but ——" oe did not press her. "Well, you must come ain when your uncle is here," she said. "And would send my compliments to your mother, t I do not think that she would be pleased to ve them. I am glad that you came." Zoe was ding the way to the hall. "I am glad, t"—she turned and took Teresa's hand and oke firmly—"I do not think that you were se to come again, my dear Teresa." She ned forward and kissed Teresa, who for a oment was engulfed in a wave of garlic, gar- nia and peppermints. "Good-by. I am glad at I have seen you—just once."

The front door was opened. Teresa and ark were outside, walking down the steps to e pavement. She stopped at the bottom and ve her hand to Mark. "You've been very d," she said, "but you mustn't bother to me with me. I can get a taxi at the corner." e smiled at Mark and walked away—and en turned to give one last salute to Zoe.

She saw Zoe looking down and smiling, and en she saw the smile vanish. She even saw e mouth open—but she did not hear the cry warning that issued from it. Mark's shout unded dimly in her ears, and it was the last sound she heard, for, half turning to see what had caused Zoe's change of expression, she was too late to save herself from stumbling against the poles that supported the scaffolding round the building next door. The impact threw her off balance; she made an attempt at recovery, then she knew that she was falling. A stabbing flash, and she knew no more.

Teresa opened her eyes to find herself lying on a strange bed in a semidarkened room. "It's all right," came Mark's voice, low, steady, infinitely reassuring. "You hit your head, but not badly. We brought you into the house again, and you're on your uncle's bed in your uncle's room."

Teresa lay still. "What time is it?"

"Just after seven."

"I—I've got to get home," she said.

"Yes. But if you're sensible, you'll stay where you are tonight and leave in the morning. We rang up your house."

"Oh . . . thank you. Who ——"

"I did the telephoning. I spoke to Miss Hyde. I merely said that you were staying to dinner."

"Didn't she sound surprised?"

"She wanted to know why you hadn't telephoned yourself, and I said I'd offered to do it for you. I think you'd be wise to keep fairly quiet for a bit."

Teresa lay thinking as well as she could; her head was throbbing, and she had a faint feeling of nausea. "If you'll tell her—Miss Hyde—that I've decided to stay the night—that I've got one of my school headaches ——"

"School headaches?"

"Yes. I get bad headaches sometimes—and she calls them my school headaches because that's when they began."

"I'll tell her. She'll know I couldn't have made that up."

"Thank you." She closed her eyes, and was grateful to him for staying in the chair by her bedside, unmoving and silent.

She fell after a time into a light doze; when she awoke, she saw that the door of the room was ajar, letting in a shaft of light from the passage; she could hear whispering. She stirred, and Mark moved from the doorway to admit Zoe.

"I'm so sorry"—Teresa managed a smile—"to have given you all this trouble."

"Trouble? What is the trouble?" asked Zoe, her voice, for sickroom purposes, pitched an octave lower. "There is no trouble. You must lie still and rest—and you must eat a little something. Nobody in the whole world can cook like me, and I have something special for you. I think you should try to take it—isn't it so? Mark will look after you and I will go down and fetch something."

She went out and Mark stood for some moments looking down at Teresa. "You look better," he said. "Feel better?"

"Much better, thank you." Her eyes were on a photograph in a silver frame standing on the dressing table, and Mark nodded.

"Your mother," he said. "That's how it was I recognized you when I first saw you." He paused. "Why did you come here?"

"It was a stupid idea," said Teresa, "and I'm ashamed of it. I was making up a little fantasy about finding my uncle and uniting him with my mother and patching up their quarrel so that he could be a companion for her."

"Where was Zoe to fit in?"

"I'd pictured him as a lonely widower," said Teresa, and heard Mark's delighted laughter.

"Well, well, well," he said, sobering. "It was a nice thought. Do you want me to ring up your fiancé?"

"How did you —— Oh, my ring."

"Yes. I observe, you observe," said Mark. "Did you tell him you were coming here?"

"Not exactly; I just told him about the plan. My mother had gone off on a fortnight's cruise, and it seemed a good chance to ——"

"Spy out the land. What do you think of Zoe?"

"I like her. Is this a boardinghouse?"

"No. That is, I'm the only one here that's outside the circle. Zoe lives in two rooms on the ground floor, does the cooking and some of the housework. Maxie does what's known as the rough. The baron, as I told you, goes out every evening to play his violin in a restaurant, and his wife makes a little money by sewing. Maxie's daughter Paloma has a room opposite theirs; she's one of the most alluring exponents of Spanish dancing I've ever had the pleasure of watching. And there you have, so to speak, the family. I'm the only outsider, and I only got in after great difficulty. And here"—he turned—"here's Zoe with something that smells very good."

"Come; eat," ordered Zoe briskly. "Mark, your dinner is ready and you must go downstairs and eat it."

"I'll be back," said Mark, and went out.

Zoe took the chair by the bed. "Do you feel well to talk?" she asked.

"Yes."

"How much," went on Zoe, "do you know about that quarrel long ago? Does your mother ever speak of her brother?"

"No."

"Ah." The sound was noncommittal. "And now I am going to ask you to do something: when you go away from here, please do not speak of us all to your mother. Let it all be as it was. Do not tell her of Maxie, or Paloma, or the baron and his wife. Forget us all, my dear, and do not try to mix people who cannot be mixed. Do you understand?"

"Yes."

"Your uncle will be sorry to have missed you, but ——" She paused and sat for some time without speaking, her eyes fixed unseeingly on Coralie's photograph. "Yes," she said, rousing herself at last, "I am glad, yes, very glad that we met. Because when your mother speaks of me—if she ever speaks of me—you will know that I am not as bad as she thought. I was working for your uncle; I was his housekeeper, his laundress, his cook, his housemaid—everything. And I was his mistress. I would not have married him, but it seemed a sensible thing to do—he was alone, he was not any more very rich, he wanted to stay in this house. There was no romance, but I am French and we are in these matters very sensible. I had been married before; I was a widow, without children, without money; I was glad to marry your uncle. But when he married me, he cut away the last strings between your mother and himself."

She paused, and seemed once more lost in thought.

"Did you," asked Teresa after a time, "ever meet my father after the quarrel?"

"Yes. Once, he came here with his cousin, Miss Hyde. They told me that if I wanted them to help me at any time, they would do so. Your father was a very good man, Teresa. I wish you could have known him. And now"—her voice was suddenly brisk—"now no more of the past. It is finished. I am glad that you will rest here tonight; tomorrow Mark will drive you home, and we shall remember each other—but I think it will be wise that you do not come here again."

Teresa, left alone, looked round the room, taking in its details for the first time. She saw that it was a bed-sitting room, plainly and somewhat barely furnished, neat and—save for the photograph of her mother—bare of ornament. She wondered if her uncle used the room as a refuge. She wished she knew more about him. Not a single person—Lolly, Sir Lawrence, Zoe—had said anything reassuring about his appearance or his character; very little emerged of the facts and nothing at all of the man. He quarreled, he borrowed money—and he traveled. He had traveled far from his beginnings, Teresa thought, if he could make his home in this bare house with Maxie and Paloma and the frail old couple in the rooms opposite.

She heard a knock on the door, and at her call Mark entered. He looked lazy and relaxed, but she noted also that when the observer met his eyes, the impression of lethargy vanished. In the gray depths Teresa had seen lazy amusement, but she knew now that below this was watchfulness and even wariness.

"I rang up your house again," he said. "I spoke to Miss Hyde."

"Lolly? Oh, what did she say?" asked Teresa eagerly.

"She said she was sorry you had a headache and she sent you her love." He nodded toward the door, through which a medley of sounds was penetrating. "Does the noise disturb you?"

"No. I suppose one would get used to it. How long have you lived here?"

"Two months."

"And my uncle hasn't been home all that time?"

"No. Zoe says that he keeps writing to assure her that he'll be back this week, next week, sometime—but he stays where he is."

"Why do you ——" She hesitated. "Why do you live here? I can see that you like it now; but when you first were shown the place, didn't you—didn't you find them all a little odd?"

He smiled. "Perhaps that's why I was so anxious to stay." He leaned on the rail at the foot of the bed. "I stay here because I find them all interesting—and mysterious."

"Mysterious?"

"If people don't tell you about their lives, you find yourself weaving life stories round them. Then you probe a little—very gently—and you find that sometimes your stories weren't much off the beam. I made Maxie a hero of the Resistance—and found that he was."

"Is that where he ——"

"—— lost his arm? No. He lost his arm in an accident at the beginning of the war. It's all very interesting. Why, I ask myself, does every sound in the house stop instantly when

"Keep in mind that I'm still wearing my shorts and glasses."

the front doorbell rings—or when strange voices are heard in the hall? Why does the baron lock his door if a strange step sounds on the staircase? Paloma is so beautiful; why doesn't her father allow men—young men, decent men—into the house?"

She looked at him for the first time with frank and undisguised interest; he waited until her scrutiny was at an end.

"What's the verdict?" he asked.

"Perhaps I'm expecting too much when I try to form an opinion of a man I've known for only a couple of hours."

"Much too much," he agreed. "Besides, before you can make up your mind about a person, you've got to place them against some sort of background—and for some reason, you refuse to accept me as part of the family at Number Fifty-four."

"No, I don't. It just seemed ——" She stopped. "What do you do?"

"I'm what's known as something-in-the-City. On most mornings I go out punctually to work and don't get back until six—but there are days when I get out earlier. This, most fortunately, was one of those days."

He had turned to go. She saw his long, lean back and one of his hands—thin, rather bony—on the handle of the door; he looked back. "There's some arrangement about fixing you up for the night in Paloma's things; you're more or less of ■ size. I'll be back."

Teresa settled back against the pillows and tried to assess how much had happened since she had stopped outside the house earlier in the evening. In spite of herself, her interest had been quickened; when she went away, she would take with her unsatisfied curiosity, certain regrets and—oddest of all—a feeling of having missed something important. Mark Tudor sensed something below the surface in this house and had tried to make her sense it too—and had succeeded.

The lovely face that had appeared for a moment over the banister looked warily round the door. At Teresa's smile, Paloma entered. She lifted a short, white cotton nightdress, gaily embroidered. With a gesture that was grace itself, she pointed to her own figure and then to Teresa.

"We're the same size," she said in French.

"It's very kind of you to lend it to me."

There was a knock, and Zoe put her head round the door. "Paloma, go and tell everybody not to use the bathroom now; Teresa must get ready for bed. Go." She laid down sheets and pillowcases. "While you are in the bathroom, I shall make the bed." She went on in English: "You find it comfortable to lie on?"

"Yes, thank you."

"Your uncle likes a comfortable bed. That is his dressing gown hanging behind the door—please use it if you wish."

Teresa got to her feet experimentally. She found herself less shaky than she had anticipated; her head still ached a little, but she had lost the feelings of giddiness and nausea. She undressed and put on Paloma's nightdress; then, taking her uncle's dressing gown from the peg on the door, she enveloped herself in it and went out onto the landing.

Out there, the noises from all parts of the house, muffled behind the closed door, now sounded clearly. From the kitchen came voices: Zoe's and Maxie's. From a room opposite the one Teresa had occupied came more voices, one thin, one gruff: the baron and the baronne were talking. From upstairs, a new sound—Teresa would have said it was a child's, but nobody had said anything about a child.

She went into the bathroom and applied herself to washing. When she had done, she walked out onto the landing, and the sound of voices came once more to her ears. Upstairs, a guitar began to twang softly. Then she heard the sound of the front doorbell.

Instantly, all sounds ceased. Over all the house was utter, absolute silence. Teresa found that she, too, had become motionless and tense. Like the house, she was waiting. In spite of all her efforts, she found a sense of fear creeping over her.

Then footsteps were heard on the stairs leading from kitchen to hall. Leaning over the banister, Teresa saw Zoe walking to the front door. A key turned—and Zoe's voice, loud and protesting, broke the silence.

"Mark! But how is this that you ring the bell? You have lost your key?"

And then Mark's voice, slow, laconic. "Left it behind. Sorry to bother you, Zoe."

"Come in. You are very naughty. It is only Mark," Zoe shouted up the stairs. "He left his key behind."

The house relaxed. The baron and the baronne resumed their talk; Zoe went down once more to the kitchen and was heard speaking to Maxie; the notes of the guitar sounded again, sad, lingering. Up the stairs came Mark's footsteps, light and swift. He reached the landing and came face to face with Teresa. For a moment she could have sworn that there was triumph in his look—and then the curtain had dropped, as she had already learned that it could drop, screening everything he wished to conceal.

Teresa stared at him, and suddenly a wave of discomfort, of unrest engulfed her. There was something below the surface—and he knew what it was, and would keep his own counsel for as long as it suited him.

"I'll drive you home tomorrow," he said, "if I may?"

A sound from the stairs above made them both turn. Teresa saw scrambling downstairs a small boy of about four—pajama-clad, tousle-headed, dragging behind him a somewhat bald Teddy bear. He was almost the plainest child she had ever seen, and the most appealing. His hair was short and straight and stuck up like a bottle brush. His face was freckled, his mouth too large, his nose scarcely there. His teeth, large, square and widely spaced, looked not unlike milestones.

He reached the landing and then, to Teresa's amazement, Mark Tudor swung him up into his arms. "Got you," he said. "On your way to the kitchen for snacks, eh?"

"No. Came downstairs to find you."

"And now you'll go upstairs to find your bed. Say good night to the lovely lady."

"'Night."

"What's his name?" inquired Teresa.

"David."

"David and what else?" she asked.

"David Tudor, of course." Mark sounded surprised. "Didn't Paloma introduce you?"

A variety of sensations, all strange and most of them unsettling, rose in Teresa. Keeping tight control over herself, she walked to the door of her uncle's room. "Good night, David," she said—and then to Mark, "Is he yours?"

Mark bent his head and dug it affectionately into the small boy's stomach. Then he looked up and spoke with manifest pride. "Naturally, he's mine," he said. "And when I say naturally, I don't want you to misunderstand me."

Teresa said good night and closed the door gently. Then she turned and stood staring thoughtfully across the room. The impressions of the past twenty-four hours had been confusing enough, but nothing had been so bewildering as the past few moments. Mark Tudor—with or without a small boy called David. What did it matter to her? Nothing. Nothing whatsoever. But with dismay creeping over her and bringing her close to panic, Teresa acknowledged to herself that it did matter. It mattered a great deal.

Fortune smiles upon the person who can laugh at himself. BRENDAN FRANCIS

When Teresa awoke, her watch told her that it was eight o'clock. She felt well and strong and ready to rise and begin her preparations for going home. She thought of Mark Tudor and decided that she would not allow him to drive her down to the cottage; she would go home by train. He was pleasant, she told herself, he was intelligent and he was amusing and—she hesitated—yes, he had undeniable charm, but there was also something about him that she found baffling.

She remembered the speculative look in his eyes as they had sometimes rested on her; he had, she thought, a watchful air. If he was looking to her to help him solve the mystery, real or imaginary, that lay over the house, he would look in vain; she was going home to resume her normal way of life with her mother, with Lolly and with Neville.

Neville. Getting out of bed, she found herself saying his name aloud; the sound gave her a pleasant sense of security. Neville, she reflected with satisfaction, was a man who, when he spoke, spoke clearly and to the point; his lips never uttered something that his eyes contradicted. One knew exactly where one was with him.

She had, suddenly, a strange but strong feeling that she was not alone in the room. Then she saw a small hand come up and grasp the bedrail; from under the bed rose David Tudor, his mouth full of food, crumbs covering the coat of his pajamas.

"How long have you been under there?" asked Teresa in astonishment.

After making one or two attempts to speak he removed a large piece of toast from his mouth. "I was eating my breakfast."

Conversation would clearly be impossible until he had eaten it; Teresa waited. His likeness to Mark at this moment was very strong—it showed in the rather long face, the long hands—and the calm, almost bland look.

Important news for Mothers...

"Lysol" is Asian Flu Tested

KILLS ASIAN FLU VIRUS RAPIDLY ON CONTACT WHEN USED AS DIRECTED ON LABEL

At the first appearance of Asian Flu in this country, "Lysol" brand disinfectant was laboratory-tested and proved to kill Asian Flu virus rapidly on contact.

Since Asian Flu virus can be spread from contaminated surfaces, regular disinfection with "Lysol" will help protect you and your family against viral infection.

"Lysol" also kills other disease bacteria on contact; therefore, regular disinfection with "Lysol" will reduce the risk of secondary infections, like pneumonia—the real danger of Asian Flu.

Precautions you can take against catching Asian Flu:

- Try to avoid crowds, also exposure to anyone who might be coming down with Asian Flu. Sore throat, coughing, fever are danger signs to watch out for.
- See that you and your family get plenty of rest, drink enough water, eat nourishing food, keep regular.
- Remind your family to wash hands frequently; to cover their own coughs and sneezes; to cover mouth and nose if near a sneezer or cougher.
- Disinfect regularly while you clean. Add "Lysol" to your suds.

If someone in your home already has Asian Flu:

- Isolate the sufferer wherever possible.
- Disinfect the sickroom floor, night stand, anything the sufferer touches—Use "Lysol."
- Give special attention to the bathroom—Wash down surfaces with "Lysol" solution.

Unless otherwise told by your doctor or health authorities, Asian Flu can be treated at home. Follow your doctor's orders. Help prevent spread of infection. Disinfect!

"Where's your breakfast?" he inquired, at the end of the last mouthful.

"I'll go down and get it when I'm dressed. Hadn't you better go and dress?"

"It isn't time yet."

"Don't you go to school?"

"No. I'm too small for a proper school. I go to a nursery school," he said.

"Well, they'll be looking for you, won't they? Your—your mummie."

"I haven't got one. She went up to heaven," explained David. "Long, long, long ago. Munfs and munfs and munfs ago. What's your name?"

"Teresa."

"Have you come to live in this room?"

"No. I'm going home soon."

"Did Paloma give you that nightdress?"

Teresa laughed and stood up. "What you need," she said, "is a notebook and pencil." She put on the patched dressing gown and picked up her towel.

"Are you going to have a barf?"

"Yes." Teresa smiled down at the small, upturned face. "Hadn't you better run upstairs now?"

"Does your hair curl all by itself?"

"Yes. It ——" She paused as a knock sounded on the door. "Come in."

Mark stood outside. He was fully dressed; his smile was warm and friendly. "You haven't," he asked, "by any chance seen anything of—ah! There he is! Has he been bothering you?"

"No." Teresa, to her own surprise and displeasure, heard the coolness in her voice.

"She wants a barf, and it's my time for a barf," said David.

"Well, you'll have to hang on and have second bath, old fellow. Now say good-by to the lady," said Mark, "and tell her you're sorry you invaded her sanctuary. Now move. Left, right. Bath's yours, Miss Thurloe," he said as they went up the stairs.

Before Teresa could shut the door, a call came from downstairs. "Is that you, Teresa?"

Teresa leaned over the banisters; at the foot of the stairs, dressed, aproned, looking neat and businesslike, stood Zoe.

"When you are ready, come downstairs. You will not mind to eat—you will not mind eating in the kitchen?"

"Not at all, but I don't have much breakfast, thank you. Just coffee and ——"

"Ah, always the same from you girls! Just like Paloma. Toast, toast, toast, coffee and nothing else. But come down when you are ready."

She vanished, and Teresa was alone on the landing. In the morning light, the house looked bare and poor. Where, she wondered, had all the furniture gone? There were things at the cottage which she knew her mother had brought from this house on her marriage: a beautiful spinet, now a sideboard; a set of Chippendale chairs, an inlaid desk and other valuable pieces. Since it was reasonable to suppose that her brother had possessed similarly good pieces, what had happened to them? Teresa finished dressing and then walked down the stairs and across the hall. Going to the head of the stairs leading to the basement, she stood still for a few moments, looking down at the colorful scene below.

A huge trestle table was covered with a vivid cloth; Zoe, at the old-fashioned stove, was working among shining copper pans. Maxie was seated beside Paloma at one end of the long table; at the other end sat the old baron and his wife, he in a patched and faded dressing gown, she in a long white robe. Swift chatter sounded in French. And then Maxie looked up and saw Teresa, and there fell the now-familiar silence—sudden, inexplicable, complete.

Zoe turned from the stove. "Ah, Teresa! Come down, please. A cup for Miss Thurloe, Maxie—and a napkin. Sit down, Teresa."

Teresa sat down—but there was no resumption of the careless ease she had witnessed from the top of the stairway. Paloma gulped the last drops of her coffee and, with a smile toward Teresa, slipped away. The baron bowed as he helped his wife to her feet and led her up the stairs. Soon nobody remained in the great kitchen but Teresa and her aunt.

"They are shy," explained Zoe, placing fresh toast and coffee before Teresa. "They are good people, but they do not like to mix with strangers."

Teresa said nothing; she was wondering whether her uncle came down and took his meals here, or whether they were carried up to him. She would have liked to ask—this and other questions—but there seemed little to be gained by adding to her knowledge of a man she would probably never meet. There was one thing, however, that she felt she must know. "When my uncle comes back, will you tell him that I came?"

There was a pause. Zoe sat down on the chair that the baron had occupied, rested her elbows on the table and cupped her cheeks in her hands. "I shall not tell him," she said. "It would—it would accomplish nothing."

"But if he wanted to see me ——"

"So much I am sure of," Zoe said. "He will never go to see you. Never." There was finality in the words.

"If you're ready," came Mark's voice, "I'm ready to take you."

Zoe's farewell was affectionate, but brief. Of the others there was no sign. Drawn up outside the house was an aristocratic but shabby sports car which, Mark explained as he handed her into it, had been bought with more regard for performance than for appearance.

Teresa turned as they drove away, and gave a last look at the house. "Please," she said, "if you'll drive me to the station, I can get a train and be home in just over an hour."

"But suppose you collapsed in the train. I wouldn't have a moment's peace unless I delivered you personally to your home."

"It's a weekday, and you said you had a job in the City."

"A job, fortunately, which doesn't necessitate my clocking in and out. Are there any other obstacles you can think of? Your fiancé, of course, probably wouldn't care to see you roaming the countryside with a strange man. When I say strange, I mean merely a man you haven't known for very long. But your fiancé is away and for the moment I can take his place. When I say take his place ——"

"Why," asked Teresa, turning to study him curiously, "do you take such delight in creating situations which don't exist?"

"I never create situations which don't exist."

LETTER

By HANNAH KAHN

And now we too must go our separate ways,
We who were bound by school, by town, by all
Inconsequential and remembered days,
The world of childhood being tight and small,
Yet rimmed for us by many things that we Could not then comprehend and never shall.
So it had once been with us . . . so it must be
When you have gone, when I must learn to go
By my own light. That which you shared with me
Is not forgotten. Always I shall know
Because of you a more intense delight
In what I see. Whatever winds shall blow
Through time, through space, beyond and past my sight
I will remember you against the night.

"Yes, you do. You want me to think that there's some secret—some sort of mystery at my uncle's house."

"There is some sort of secret at your uncle's house," he said calmly.

"The fact that they all listen every time someone comes to the house doesn't mean anything sinister. They might be merely curious."

"They might. Did you think that they were merely curious?"

He stopped for petrol, and they strolled into the garden of an adjacent inn; Teresa sat on a deck chair in the sun and Mark brought out drinks; he propped himself against an insecure bench and looked down at her and raised his glass.

"To your future," he said. "May it be as sheltered as your past."

She looked up at him, the color rising in her cheeks. "Sheltered? What's wrong with being sheltered?"

"It's a highly desirable state—for women, that is."

"But nowadays women aren't and so I've been a sort of parasite—is that what you meant?"

"We ought to get on well," he commented. "When I say something provocative, you stare at the scenery. When I propose an entirely harmless toast, you show your claws—which is interesting, because I wouldn't have suspected that you knew how to use them."

"What made you say that I was . . . sheltered?" she asked.

"That's easy. The world's a hard place, and most people have to push their way through it. Even gently nurtured women. There are certain people, of course, who lack the ability to push: the weak ones; the meek ones. But I don't think you're meek and I'm certain you're not weak; therefore the reason you don't exhibit any sign of pushfulness is either (a) you don't need to push or (b) someone's doing it for you. Your mother in the past and your fiancé in the future."

"But I don't ——"

"Don't interrupt. And don't be annoyed at my calling you sheltered. I like your gentle expectation that life's doors will all open before you as you approach them. They will. I like your—your air. Did you know you had an air? Half shyness, half a very, very charming dignity. I recognized it as I came toward you yesterday—while you were standing looking at the house. I recognized it because I've been waiting all my life to see it at some time—in some woman." He broke off. "I wonder if your fiancé would mind my laying myself at your feet in this way?"

His voice was utterly casual. Teresa stared at him and felt the color burning in her cheeks.

After a moment, he smiled. "You're angry?"

"No." She was not angry, but she felt that she ought to have been. "You can't say that to me, because I'm—because I ——"

"Because you belong to somebody else?" Mark leaned forward and raised her left hand and looked at the ring on its third finger. "Until that," he said slowly, "is a wedding ring, you belong only to yourself."

He released her hand gently, and stood up. Teresa walked beside him to the car, her mind spinning. He opened the door for her and then put out a hand and stopped her as she was about to get in.

"Look back," he said. Teresa glanced over her shoulder, and he went on speaking quietly. "A chair, a bench, green grass, a shady tree. Nothing out of the way about any of them—but somehow, I have a feeling that it's a place we'll both remember forever."

She was in the car; he was beside her and now there was silence. The miles slipped by, and Teresa did not notice their passing; her eyes were on the two lean, strong hands holding the wheel.

The sun went behind clouds as they neared the cottage and emerged again in time to light it and show it at its best. As Mark turned in at the gate, Teresa shook herself out of her abstraction and stared at it—and for the first time saw that its picturesqueness had a faintly unreal quality. After the drab, workaday look that characterized the house in Grosvenor Drive, this pink-and-white building looked not unlike a doll's house.

Mark stopped the car, but made no move to get out. Instead he leaned back and sat for some moments looking about him. "Pretty much as I'd pictured it," he said. "House of the sugar-plum fairy. No wonder you keep running back here for shelter."

"If you say that again, I shall be very angry," said Teresa.

"Angry? Could you be?" He was not teasing; he sounded as though he really wanted to know.

She sat considering her reply—and as she did so, the front door opened and Lolly stood looking out at them. Neither Teresa nor Mark saw her, and slowly she took in their rapt interest, their complete absorption in each other. She could not see Mark's face, but she could see his head, bent over Teresa's—and she could see clearly enough Teresa's expression.

She had hoped, once, to see Teresa look at Neville with that still, intent, utterly charmed gaze—but had seen only friendliness and, at times, affection. Four years—and in less than a day this stranger had lit within her a lamp that nobody, up to now, had ever kindled. Teresa, with that soft gleam behind her eyes, her feelings written beautifully, movingly on her face; Teresa—and an unknown man.

Anger rose in Lolly and steadied her. She advanced firmly down the steps and, walking up to the car, stood staring down upon its occupants. "Aren't you coming in?" she asked Teresa. "You live here, remember?"

They got out and Lolly stood stolidly, unsmilingly by, as Mark was presented to her. She gave him a stiff bow.

"Kind of you to bring Miss Thurloe home," she said. "Teresa, is your headache better?"

"It wasn't a headache, Lolly. I fell on the pavement as I left the house, and got a bit shaken up."

"You mean you fainted or something?" demanded Lolly. "Did they call a doctor?"

"I didn't need a doctor," said Teresa. "Zoe looked after me. Hadn't we better go inside and talk about it there?"

Lolly was staring at Mark, frowning thoughtfully. "Seen you before somewhere—I'm sure of it," she said slowly. "Can't think where. Tudor . . . Tudor." She shook her head. "Let's go inside; we're keeping Mr Tudor waiting and I dare say he's anxious to get back to London."

She led the way to the drawing room.

"Now," she said, "I'd like to hear exactly what happened last night. And then we won't detain Mr. Tudor."

Light broke on Lolly's face as she stared at him, but when she spoke again there was an odd sound of disappointment in her voice. "Knew it," she said gloomily. "Knew I'd seen you before. But it wasn't you—it was your mother. Knew her as a girl. Where's your mother now?" she asked.

"She died very soon after I was born."

"Then I'm sorry," said Lolly. "She was a lovely girl—and she was a healthy girl, too, and she ought to have lived longer than that."

"Did Lawrence know her too?" asked Teresa.

"He knew her very well. In fact ——" Lolly broke off. "Tell me what happened yesterday," she said. "Your uncle wasn't there, Mr Tudor told me."

"He was abroad," said Teresa. "And"—she smiled at Mark—"I'll agree that it was a silly plan to go at all, but if it hadn't been for Mark, I would have given up the idea."

"And why," inquired Lolly of Mark, "should you have been interested in whether ——"

"I'm deeply interested," said Mark. "I've been living there for the past two months and I've come to know them all very well."

"Who's all?" asked Lolly.

Mark began to count on his fingers. "There's Mrs. Towers; there's the baron and his wife; there's Maxie and his beautiful daughter Paloma."

"All living there?"

"Yes," said Teresa. "And Mark and his son live there too."

"My what?" came from Mark in the utmost astonishment.

Teresa looked at him, the color coming into her cheeks. "Isn't David ——" she began.

"—— my son? No. I rather wish he were. He's exactly what I'd want as a son. He's my half brother. My father," explained Mark, "was a widower for well over twenty years. He married again, nearing sixty, and he was nearly thirty years older than his wife and I was rather a mistake—but David was the result." He looked at Lolly, who was following the account with avid interest. "She found my father rather boring and left him—to his enormous relief—just before he died. She ran away with another man—and left David behind. And that"—his voice deepened—"that is the part I shall never understand."

"And where is she now?" Lolly demanded.

"At the bottom of the Atlantic Ocean." There was satisfaction in Mark's voice. "She was on her way to America with yet another gentleman friend, and she vanished. They said she'd been drinking, but I feel that some benevolent member of society took her up to the boat deck one dark night and pushed her overboard."

"Well, don't sound so pleased. The poor soul ——" Lolly paused. "How old is this boy?"

"Rising five," said Mark. "Healthy, with a splendid constitution, my own easygoing nature and my own high principles. Mrs. Towers is very fond of him."

"Have you met Mr. Towers?"

"Not yet. He's expected home soon. But his wife has decided not to tell him anything about his niece's visit."

"I'm thankful for that, anyway. Teresa, Neville knows that you spent the night at your uncle's house," said Lolly. "He rang up last night from Brussels."

"And you told him?"

"Naturally I told him. He's coming home this morning. He'll probably be here soon."

The last sentence was addressed directly to Mark, who heard it unmoved. "He must have been worried," he said calmly.

Lolly looked nonplused; she was so obviously waiting for him to rise and take his leave that this bland persistence took her unawares. Her irritation was so manifest that Teresa found herself laughing. She rose and went toward the cocktail cabinet.

"What'll you drink?" she asked Mark.

"Sherry, if you've got it, please."

"When I've had my drink, I'll go upstairs and lie down till lunchtime," Teresa said, and saw relief in Lolly's eyes. "It was so kind of you," she went on, addressing Mark, "to bring me home—and I'm more than grateful for everything you've done."

This was dismissal indeed, and Mark bowed. But he drank slowly and talked with an ease and fluency that made Lolly forget how time was passing. When at last he began to take his leave, it was too late. A crunching on the gravel, a peal on the doorbell announced the arrival of a visitor; as Teresa reached the door of the drawing room, it opened to admit Neville.

They came face to face; over her head he gave a brief look at Lolly, and a more lingering one at Mark. Teresa presented her cheek, and found his hand turning her head so that he could bend and rest his lips on hers.

"Are you all right?" he asked, putting his arm round her shoulders as once more she faced the others. "How's the head?"

"Well, it wasn't really a headache," said Teresa. "Neville, this is Mr. Tudor. Mark, this is my fiancé, Neville Morley."

Neither man looked enchanted.

"It was a fall," Mark explained. "Teresa fell over some scaffolding as she was leaving the house. I carried her in again and we persuaded her that it would be wiser for her to wait until morning before going home." He smiled at Teresa—a brief, warm, intimate smile. "Never," he said, "would I have imagined that so slim a girl would make so strong a man so bereft of breath up so short a flight of stairs."

Nobody seemed to have any comment to make. Teresa freed herself from Neville's encircling arm. Neville gazed across the room at the other man and a frown of displeasure gathered on his brow. Lolly looked as though a bat had flown into the room and she was wondering how to get it out again and at the same time prevent it from flying into her face.

Mark turned to Teresa. "I'm afraid I must go," he said. "I shall come again, if I may, to see how you are."

"I think," said Neville, "that she'll be all right now. Thanks for being on the spot."

"There's always the chance," pointed out Mark, "of delayed shock. I'll look in tomorrow to see that everything's going on well."

He was gone. Lolly went out onto the drive and walked beside him to his car. "Mr. Tudor," she began firmly, "I'm going to say something to you. Please don't come back."

Mark's eyebrows went up.

"You've been very kind and we're all grateful," said Lolly, "but a man who's engaged to a girl doesn't like to come back from somewhere and find another man in the drawing room looking possessive."

"Possessive?"

"That's what I said. You were doing your best to be annoying just now, and I hope I don't sound inhospitable, but there's no point in beating about the bush, and I think you saw quite clearly that Mr. Morley would rather you stayed away."

Mark spoke quietly. "The moment Teresa tells me to stay away, I'll stay away."

"She's—she's engaged," said Lolly abruptly. "Doesn't that mean anything to you?"

"Yes," said Mark. "It means everything—if a woman is in love with the man. But"—his voice was gentle—"she isn't in love with him."

"Look," began Lolly desperately, "you're a complete stranger and ——"

"Extraordinary, isn't it?" he said. "One moment I was walking along the street, thinking of nothing. And then—I saw her. She was standing in front of the house, looking up at it. I waited for her to move on—my heart felt . . . pinched, as I waited. She would go—and I would remember that glimpse all my life and wonder who she was and where she had come from and why she had been snatched away from me after one brief look. But . . . she didn't go away. She stood there, and I came nearer, and nearer—and then I spoke to her, and I understood that if I couldn't do something, say something to prevent her, she would go away . . . forever."

He paused, and Lolly waited.

"And you—you stopped her," she said flatly at last. "How did you do it?"

"How? I don't know. When she drove away, I realized that perhaps I was imagining that I had felt something pass between us. The world had changed for me—but for her? She had gone—but if she felt anything, any slight part of what I had felt; if I had succeeded in communicating one small part of my feelings . . . she would come back."

"And she came back."

"Yes. She came back. I wanted to shout and to take her in my arms—but I didn't, of course. I had to behave as though my heart was beating normally, as though a wild hope hadn't been born in me."

"Please—please go away," begged Lolly.

"Yes, I'll go away—but I shall come back. She's wearing another man's ring—but she doesn't love him. Haven't I got eyes? He came into the room—and I watched her, and what did I see? Affection. The kindest, the most gentle of welcomes—and no more. If I can see that, then you must see it too. And so must her mother."

"He's a good man," said Lolly. "He's decent, he's got a good background and she'll never want for anything. And her mother is set on the marriage."

He looked at Lolly. "Nothing I do," he said slowly, "will ever hurt Teresa."

"Look"—Lolly spoke urgently—"you don't understand. There are things you don't know—can't know. If you don't go away, you'll cause a lot of trouble. Her mother ——"

"If Teresa is happy, her mother will be happy."

"No—yes." Lolly wrung her hands. "You must leave things as they are."

Mark got into his car and settled himself at the wheel and switched on the engine. "If Teresa doesn't love me," he said slowly, "nothing I can do will make any difference—to anybody."

"You're going on with this?"

"To the end," said Mark. The car moved into the roadway. Lolly stood staring after it, her eyes dark with foreboding.

Lolly's religion was of an unorthodox kind. If asked, she would have said that she was a plain Christian; if pressed, she would have explained that this meant keeping in close touch with Christ and having as little as possible to do with the church. Keeping in close touch meant flopping down on her knees at odd moments of the day, in her bedroom or in her sitting room or in the linen cupboard, to remind God of His duty toward her.

"O God," she prayed in the bathroom on Mark's departure, "keep that man away. As soon as I looked at him, I thought, 'Now that should have been her man.' But You sent him too late, Lord, so don't send him any more, or there'll be trouble. There's nothing the matter with Neville, and we thank Thee for him; he'll make a good husband. But if she begins to ask herself questions, if she decides that it won't be Neville after all, then her mother will —— O God, something tells me there's trouble coming."

Getting to her feet, she found that she felt a good deal better. She had told God; now it was up to Him. If He knew what He was about, He would keep Mark Tudor away.

She was all the more dismayed, therefore, when two evenings later the maid came and told her that a Mr. Tudor was waiting.

Lolly marched with determination to the drawing room, greeted Mark soberly and waved him to a chair. "Sit down," she ordered. "We may as well have this out."

Mark smiled at her. "I quite agree. You begin."

"Very well. First, I have nothing against you, as far as anybody can judge by appearances. But I do think that you enjoy stirring up trouble. You want to get Neville thoroughly stirred up."

"Stirred up." Mark repeated the words musingly. "If I'm any judge, nobody's ever really thrown him out of stride. I'd be interested to see how he'd react to some competition."

"It's too late for competition of any sort." She leaned forward, thrusting her plain, anxious face toward him and speaking with deep earnestness. "Mr. Tudor, will you please go away and leave things as they are? Teresa'll be happy, I promise you that. There isn't anybody in this world—except her godfather—who knows more about her and who wants to see her happy than I do. I've been with her since she was a baby, and I've protected her from—from a lot that you couldn't possibly know anything about. Leave it at that. There's more here than you can see."

"You mean that if anything turns up to upset this eminently suitable match, Teresa's mother won't like it?"

"That's what I mean."

"Mothers are very necessary," said Mark, "but their influence doesn't extend beyond their daughters' years of discretion."

Lolly's face slowly whitened. "If you won't take advice," she said slowly, "then take a warning: don't go on with this. If you go away now, and forever, Teresa won't miss you. If you stay, you'll be very wicked, and you'll pull her world down on top of her."

"What is Lady Thurloe like?" Mark asked.

"She's a very good-looking and a very charming woman. She's liked by her servants, admired by the village people, and copied by all her friends. She sits on committees and subscribes to a great many charities. She has spent a great deal of care and thought—and money—on her daughter's upbringing. She met Neville Morley and asked him to the house and this match is mostly of her own making."

Mark did not appear to be listening; he was standing with his back to her, gazing out at the sunlit garden.

"Funny thing," he said musingly. "I get the feeling here that I get in Teresa's aunt's house: something"—he spun round slowly—"something below the surface."

"There's always something below the surface," said Lolly. "Every family has secrets of one kind or another, and they don't reveal them to strangers. And now will you go away, please? Teresa is dining out."

"That's not what the maid said when she let me in, but"—Mark gave her one of his wide, attractive smiles—"I'll take your word for it."

She let him out and watched him as he got into his car. She was still standing there, brooding, when Teresa drove in with Neville ten minutes later.

Neville walked with Teresa to the door, said a word to Lolly, bent to kiss Teresa and then drove away.

"Why didn't Neville come in?" Lolly asked. "You told me he was coming to dinner."

"I asked him not to. We had a sort of argument—about Mark."

Lolly looked at her with a sinking heart. Mark. Teresa had not known him long—but he had a low, lazy, pleasant voice and gray eyes fringed by lashes that ought to have belonged to a woman. He wanted her—and she was aware of him. The house, thought Lolly, was swaying. The house, so carefully erected, so carefully built, so anxiously safeguarded—the house was in danger.

It was too much, she thought, for her to bear alone. If God didn't choose to do anything about it, she would go into Brighton and see Sir Lawrence and tell him what was happening. He would listen and he would act.

She was so busy with her own thoughts that it was some time before she noticed Teresa's abstraction. "You're very quiet," she told her at last.

"I was wondering why you hadn't told me that Mark had called. We passed him on the road. He wouldn't have come down here unless he'd come to the house."

"He did."

"And you sent him away again?"

"I did."

"Why?" Teresa's tone was one of simple inquiry. "Don't you like him?"

"A decent man," said Lolly, "doesn't hang round girls who are engaged."

"Isn't that putting it a little strongly?"

Lolly hesitated. To explain that she recognized in Mark Tudor an attraction that—if he cared to use it—few girls could resist would not improve the position. To confess that she had seen in Teresa too much interest in him—interest, and more than interest—would make matters infinitely worse. It was better to say nothing until tomorrow, when she would say it all to Sir Lawrence.

Teresa looked at her speculatively. "Lolly, are you getting secretive?"

"How so?"

"You didn't tell me you'd been to see Zoe."

"Do I have to remember every visit I made twenty-odd years ago?"

"Did you want to patch up the quarrel?"

"I did. But I found it was no good—so you see, I knew what I was talking about when I advised you to keep away." She paused. "Zoe reminded me of one of those pictures in the school storybooks—Romanian peasant. I liked her."

"So did I. Lolly, the house is . . . well, the furniture's terrible and there aren't any decent pictures or ornaments—or anything. It couldn't have been like that when mother lived there?"

"I dare say your uncle has been wearing a rut in the pavement between the house and the pawnshop. He can't go abroad as often as you say he does on four hundred a year." Lolly rose and went to the door. "See you at dinner," she said.

Teresa watched the door close, and sighed. She tried to bring her own feelings into the light and examine them—and found herself shrinking from the necessity of breaking the soft web of indecision in which she was caught. Mark—what had he said? A few words of regret that they had not met each other before. No more. That there would be more, she knew—and shrank from the knowledge. She was aware that she must search her heart, but she could not. Not yet. To search would be to find an answer that would change her life—and at this moment she was afraid.

After the meal, Teresa went up to her bedroom and, undressing, got into bed and began to read. But the book did not hold her attention, and she put out her hand to switch off the light—at that moment the telephone by the bed rang. As she picked up the receiver and heard Mark's voice, she knew that she had been waiting for his call. A little shiver of delight went through her.

"Are you up—or in bed?"

"I'm in bed."

"I was thinking of you—and some poetry came into my mind, and I wanted to say it to you. Do you know your Byron?"

"No."

"He wrote some lines which describe how I feel. May I read them to you?"

"Please."

She heard his low voice:

"'In the desert a fountain is springing
In the wide waste there still is a tree
And a bird in the solitude singing
Which speaks to my spirit of thee.'

Did I read that well?"

"Yes. Very well."

Mark went on softly:

"'Thou art my life, my love, my heart,
The very eyes of me
And hast command of every part
To live and die for thee.'"

There was silence.

"Did you listen?" he asked at last.

"Yes."

"Know who said that last bit?"

"Yes. Herrick."

"Good girl. Teresa ——"

"Yes?"

"David's in bed with a chill, and it isn't serious, but he'd like to see you. He's a very little boy, and he can't read to himself. And you have a lovely, lovely voice. Will you come?"

"I think so."

"Teresa ——"

"Yes?"

"I want you to know something. I love you. I shall love you always. And I want you to know something else. I regard a husband as an absolutely insuperable barrier between myself and any woman. I respect his claims utterly. But . . . until he's a husband, I consider that he has to keep his weapons at hand to defend whatever title he lays claim to. Darling Teresa, you don't belong to anybody—yet. Sweet Teresa, good night."

Teresa laid the telephone softly on its stand, switched off the light and lay back and stared up into the darkness.

Lolly left the house soon after breakfast on the following morning. The day was fine, and she decided that she would walk down to the village and go into Brighton by bus.

Sir Lawrence let her in and led her upstairs to the study. "You're earlier than you said you'd be," he told her, "but it's good to see you. How are you, Lolly?"

She sank into a chair and began to pull off her gloves. "I'd give a lot for a good, hot cup of coffee," she said, "but that grudging old woman of yours might give notice if you asked for it."

"We can try." Sir Lawrence summoned his resolution, rang the bell, and to the tight-lipped woman who answered it made his wishes known.

"It's early for coffee," was the surly response. "'Tisn't more than half past ten. Black, or caffy o-lay?"

"With milk, please."

The door banged, and Lolly gave a wide grin. "Lawrence, when I leave the cottage, why don't you let me come here and do for you?"

"Not a bit of it," he said. "When you leave Coralie, you'll buy yourself a little house somewhere and do for yourself. You've earned a rest." He clasped his hands behind his back and frowned down at her. "You've quite made up your mind, I suppose."

"You didn't think I'd stay after Teresa married, did you?"

"No. To be frank, I didn't. But once or twice I wondered whether perhaps the years haven't made a difference. You think she's just the same?"

"Just the same. That's why I'm worried."

"But I thought it was Teresa you were worried about. What's been going on since she came to see me?"

"She went to see Hubert. She didn't see him because he was away. She met his wife. As far as I can make out, the visit didn't come to much; the place is run as a sort of boarding-house and it's full of foreigners; but on the way out, Teresa fell—didn't hurt herself, but she stayed there the night."

"Well, go on. You said you were worried. If the visit wasn't a success, I suppose you mean that Teresa won't repeat it—and that's what you want, isn't it?"

"Yes. But it's this man," said Lolly slowly.

"Man?"

"You remember the Grants, who used to have that big house up on the downs?"

"Of course I remember them. Three of the prettiest girls I ever knew—why should I forget them?"

"One of them married a man called Tudor. Well, this man is their son and if he hasn't got his mother's beauty he's got her eyes and he's got her charm."

"What's all this got to do with Hubert?" asked Sir Lawrence in bewilderment.

"He lives in Hubert's house. He met Teresa outside and persuaded her to go in. He was with her when she fell. He carried her in. He took charge: telephoned to me, watched by her bedside, brought her home. When they arrived, she looked . . . Lawrence, she looked different: dreamy, quiet, sort of ——" She looked up, her eyes full of misery. "I'm worried. What's more, I'm frightened."

Sir Lawrence said nothing. Mrs. Crofts, her face set in grim displeasure, was bringing in

What does the Gardener do in Winter?

You can't beat the catalogues for facts and fun

By THE GARDENER'S ASSISTANT

The literature of gardening flows in an ever-gushing stream and is avidly absorbed as fast as it appears by a mighty majority of the population. If gardeners could get together, they could put into power any government they had a mind to. That's how many of us there are. And if we think that most of our reading matter, and the most instructive and entertaining, is contained in books and periodicals, we couldn't be more mistaken. Books and periodicals don't hold a candle to the catalogues, either in the volume of paper and printing employed or in the concise accumulation of factual data set forth. Catalogues are dictionaries of description, peppered with pictures, pinned down with prices, and flavored with fancy. It is depressing to think of a gardener who doesn't gather a winter crop of catalogues. They're such a harvest of information and delight.

I've never looked in a garden catalogue yet without learning something I was glad to know. But you can't look at them all. There are hundreds of them a year. Maybe thousands. And there's a limit to learning. I'll let you know later about my list. But here are a few catalogues that I consider outstanding. Some are cyclopedic; some are monographs of specialties. Though they are all put out by responsible firms with reputations to uphold, I am not endorsing here the quality of the things they sell; I'm simply describing the catalogues themselves. These I do endorse.

There is virtually nothing you will need for your garden that you won't find in the annual Garden Book put out by Montgomery Ward. Not only a wide and good variety of the whole great gamut of growing things, from seeds to trees, in all the ornamental and edible categories, described, pictured and priced, but practically all the gardening paraphernalia you're likely to require. If I were asked to suggest one single complete catalogue, good for all gardeners, this might very well be it. And the prices may come to you as a pleasant surprise.

Quite a few garden firms put a price on their catalogues, which in some cases is refunded on your first order. One of these is Wayside Gardens, of Mentor, Ohio, whose catalogues are simply gorgeous, 200 pages of superlative printing, and written with intelligence and authority. Fifty cents each is the price asked for both spring and fall editions; but they are the kind you keep—permanent and colorful reference works for flowers of all kinds, including flowering shrubs and trees.

One fascinating thing about garden catalogues is the fact that in them every plant has a price; a feature that is missing from most mere garden books and garden articles. If the prices in some catalogues are surprisingly low, in others they can be excitingly high. That is why a varied assortment of catalogues adds to your winter gardening pleasure. For then you not only face the satisfaction of bargains you can well afford, but you can contemplate the temptation to spend more than perhaps you should for something particularly choice, rare and desirable.

The big seed companies' catalogues are the classics, expert and explicit, exemplified conspicuously by Ferry's Home Garden Guide which you get free of charge from Ferry-Morse Seed Company, Detroit. Nearly one half of this 50-page paper-back is devoted to the ABC of gardening, a model of clarity and simplicity, and not an unneeded word to weed away. The rest is catalogue, likewise admirably ABC.

Another garden guide published in the guise of a catalogue is the Garden Book put out without charge by the California Spray-Chemical Corp., of Richmond, California, and Washington, D. C. This is a little booklet that goes a long way in support of the theory that the best things in life are free. Not only does it take the perplexity out of spraying, but every page is packed with a variety of other practical garden projects, having to do with plants, planting, care, construction, clothes. A little gem, as they say in the seed catalogues.

If you think you might like to grow little shrubs and trees into large ones, in the best evergreen and deciduous varieties, a catalogue that makes a specialty of telling you how, and how much, is A Short Guide (64 pages) put out free by the Kelsey Nursery Service, Highlands, New Jersey. In no time you'll be obtaining your own dogwoods, hollies and azaleas from your own back-yard nursery, free of charge.

If tropical house plants are your delight, and you can spare $1.50, I think you will thank me for letting you know about the extraordinary illustrated and descriptive listing of nearly 1400 tender plants from all over the world, called Exotics, and put out by the growers and suppliers, Julius Roehrs Company, Rutherford, New Jersey. This is a de luxe dependable catalogue in the finest sense of the word.

There are many more. So many more that I have made a list, which I may alter from time to time. To it I have appended a list of all the flower societies—the Rose, the Peony, the Iris, et cetera, et cetera. Just send a stamped addressed envelope to The Gardener's Assistant, Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

the coffee; setting it down on the table, she walked out of the room and shut the door sharply. In silence, Sir Lawrence poured out two cups and brought one to Lolly.

"You're tired; you must be, or you wouldn't take this so seriously," he said.

"You haven't seen him—and you haven't heard it all. He says he's in love with Teresa."

Sir Lawrence said, "I presume he was told that Teresa's engaged?"

"That doesn't worry him in the least."

"Then he's a bounder."

"I tell you, he isn't. An engagement," said Lolly, "is simply, in his opinion, an engagement to meet on a certain day at a certain church in order to take certain vows. Until those vows are taken—he says—the arrangement remains merely an engagement. You and I might consider it binding, but then we're the old-fashioned sort—and we're not in love, as Mark Tudor is. He considers the field's wide open, and he's going in." Lolly paused. "You've got your wish, that's one thing," she told Sir Lawrence; "you've told me over and over again that you thought Teresa should have had chances of falling in and out of love with other men before she settled down. Well, here's another man; now tell me how we deal with him."

"There's no need to make too heavy weather of it," commented Sir Lawrence after some thought. "It's up to Neville, after all."

"He's suffering from overconfidence. Neville will take a stand on his rights—and Mark Tudor will prove that he hasn't any rights. Neville will bank on Teresa's loyalty—but if she feels only affection for him, and something much stronger for the other man, then where will her loyalty lie?"

"She's given Neville a promise. She's promised to marry him."

"And if she can't follow that up by promising to love, honor and all the rest of it, do you think she won't hand him back his ring in all honesty? Of course she will. Then there's another angle which might penetrate your thick skull. Coralie will be back in just over a week. Mark Tudor will still be around. Where Coralie will ask, has this man come from? We shall have to tell her: from Hubert's house. And so she learns that Teresa went there. Do you dismiss that too?"

"No." Sir Lawrence frowned. "I don't; I can see that things might be awkward if ——"

"Awkward!" Lolly gave an exasperated snort. "Awkward! Do you think I've stayed for over twenty years in Coralie Thurloe's house in order to avoid an awkward situation?"

"But Lolly" — his voice was gentle — "twenty years is a long time. Are you sure ——"

"Quite." Lolly was at her most abrupt. "Take a tigress: is she always dangerous? No. Only when she's threatened. How long did Teresa's father know Coralie? Six years—and it wasn't until nearly two years after their marriage that he really saw what she was. And it finished him. That, at least, you believe."

"Yes. But he was a man in love, and he'd built her up into something half doll, half angel. What she destroyed wasn't a true picture of herself; it was the false one he'd had in his mind."

"It destroyed something in him—and could destroy something in Teresa. She's like her father: she's vulnerable. And she has the same blind spot: Coralie. She knows her mother, of course, better than her father ever did. But she has never seen the spectacle of Coralie deprived of something on which she has really set her heart. She has never seen the kind of scene that her father saw—and it was to prevent her from ever seeing it that her father sent for me. It was to shield Teresa from the worst of Coralie that I promised to go and live there. I told him I'd stay until a sound man turned up to marry her and take over the job—and I've kept my promise. I've acted as a buffer and a shield—and a veil."

"You've done well, Lolly."

"I've done better than well. When Teresa was a child, it was easy; later, it wasn't so easy, because her ways often ran counter to her mother's. But I've managed to prevent a showdown. And now Mark Tudor has come into the picture, and I know that trouble is coming. Coralie is going to learn that Teresa has been to Hubert's house. Coralie is going to meet Mark Tudor, who lives there. Coralie, being quicker-witted than you, is going to realize that Mark Tudor won't make the docile son-in-law that Neville would. Neville would play along with her all his life—but Mark Tudor? No and no and no. And she'll come up—once more—against an insurmountable obstacle. And she'll make another terrible, incredibly ugly scene. And this time Teresa will be there to see it—and to see her mother as she really is."

Her voice trailed off, and she sat hunched in her chair. In the silence that followed, Sir Lawrence walked to and fro, his face drawn and unhappy.

"Are you sure," he asked slowly, "that it hasn't been a mistake? Was it right to let Teresa grow up thinking her mother was one thing, when her mother was in fact another? If Teresa had learned early that her mother was, or could be, an utterly selfish and violent woman, then ——"

"I've thought it all over," said Lolly. "'Let her know the truth,' I've said to myself. 'Why shield her?' But have you ever thought what Teresa's life would have been if I hadn't been there to stand between her and her mother? I don't think Teresa would have developed into the fine young woman she is if she'd been reared in a cat-and-dog atmosphere. Sometimes the truth can be too ugly. And Coralie has many ugly sides. In the war, when she turned craven—I was there to hide the truth from Teresa. When she had intrigues with men—I was there to keep them from the house. Could I say, 'Your mother is a cheat and a liar and worse, but you must grow up fine and upright and good'—could I? No, I could only be careful that she wasn't with her mother for long periods. Boarding school, finishing school, travel abroad and then the job at Brighton—and in between, Coralie at her best, acting the pretty mother of a pre

"We needn't talk about it, Lolly; it upsets and it does no good. What do you want to do about this fellow Tudor?"
"I want you to come to the house while there, and talk to him. Next time Mark dor calls at the cottage, I'll telephone to and you've got to come at once. Pretend just dropped in casually, and I'll see that get some time alone with him."
"And then what?" asked Sir Lawrence, his ntenance full of foreboding.
"Then tell him he has no business to be ging round Teresa. Tell him her mother's ning back, and wouldn't like it. Tell him—him what in heaven you please," she burst impatiently, "but get rid of him."

I rang several times," said Teresa, "but body seemed to hear."

"They are busy," said Zoe. "They do not hear. I am the one who always hears and who answers." She glanced at Teresa's packages. "You have come to see David?"

"Yes. I felt that I'd like to come up and—and see if I could read to him, or something," said Teresa, and wondered why the words sounded so lame.

"I will take you up. Come." Zoe led the way. She opened the door of a large room, and Teresa, entering, saw two beds and several pieces of cheap furniture. The room was spotlessly clean and tidy. In the smaller bed, propped against pillows, sat David. The bed was piled with books and toys.

"See who has come to see you," said Zoe.

David grinned happily; he was obviously enjoying being treated as an invalid. Teresa advanced with her gifts; turning as David was busy inspecting them, she saw Zoe leaning against the door, her eyes closed, her expression swept clean of every disguise, and showing a weariness so great that Teresa left the bedside and went toward her.

"Zoe, please don't think I'm impertinent or—or interfering. I don't understand anything, but I feel you're worried and if I could do anything ——"

"There is nothing. You are kind, but there is nothing that anybody can do, I think."

"But I saw Paloma just now, and there was a policeman with her and ——" She stopped; Zoe's eyes had closed once more and she looked tired and crushed and past pretense. Tears came slowly from her closed eyes and began to trickle down her cheeks.

"It has been a long time," she said. "You are kind to wish to help, but you are the child of Hubert's sister—and so you, of all people, cannot help me."

"Is it money?" said Teresa impulsively, and saw Zoe smile—a smile totally without mirth.

"Yes, it is money. It is money that has brought the trouble—but money cannot take the trouble away."

"But my uncle—can't he ——"

"He can do nothing," said Zoe dully. She opened the door. "Stay with David; he will be glad to have you. Mark will not be home until lunchtime."

And then Teresa was alone with the small boy, and the adventures of Smoochy were proceeding, but with far less zest, as David recognized, than the text deserved.

"Perhaps," he observed at last, weary of correcting the reader, "you're tired."

Teresa looked up. "Well, yes—I am a little bit, David. And I'm not really a very good reader. I can play games, though; if you'd like Snakes and Ladders ——"

They were still playing when Teresa looked up to see Mark standing in the doorway. He was taking in the picture he would remember all his life: the sun slanting across the bed, the small boy, flushed with glee, the girl's fair head bent over the brightly colored board. David, who had held first place in his heart—and Teresa, who had come out of nowhere, unlooked for, and who was now as dear in an entirely different way.

He sat on the bed and rumpled David's hair. "How's everything?" he asked.

"I'm winning her," said David. "She won one and I won one and I'm nearly home and if I get a three, then I'll win her again."

They finished the game just as the door opened to admit Zoe with a tray on which was a light lunch with a glass of milk. "This is all for David," she announced, and Teresa saw that she had recovered her self-possession. "For you others, there is food if you wish."

"No; I'm taking Teresa out to lunch," said Mark. "To that French place you recommended, Zoe."

They said good-by, and Mark led Teresa out to his car. He drove silently; once he put out a hand and touched hers briefly, as though to assure himself that she was really beside him.

On a table spread with a gay cloth they ate especially recommended food and drank delicious wine. M. Laroule, an expert in these matters, noted that though both the man and the girl showed a certain intelligent interest in the food and the wine at the beginning of the meal, they grew more self-absorbed as it progressed. He made his report to his wife, who was in charge of the cash desk.

"He is in love," he told her.

"And she?"

"I can't tell. Now if he were a Frenchman —— But in his way," he conceded, "he has something. And he knows wine; that at least is a good sign."

"Do they talk of love?"

"No. But they are English, remember. It is all inside."

They were talking, not of love but of an entirely different subject.

"You said just now that you were worried about Zoe. Why?" asked Mark.

Teresa told him what had taken place when she reached the house that morning. "If I'm concerned in the money part of it," she asked, "why can't she explain exactly how? And why are policemen watching the house?"

"One policeman," corrected Mark.

"The police. What's the difference?" asked Teresa. "I saw what happened and you didn't. He tried to stop Paloma, and she pulled away from him and ran into the house." She put her arms on the table and leaned on them and spoke urgently. "Mark, Zoe's in some kind of trouble. Do you know what it is?"

"I don't know all of it—yet."

"Well, can't you tell me what you know?"

"I know—I think I know—why there's that dead silence whenever the front doorbell rings. They're frightened."

"Frightened of what? Do you know something about them that you won't tell me?" she asked.

"No. I don't know anything. There's no point in telling you my guesses. All I know for certain is that they like to check up on everybody who comes into the house. There's a ringing on the front doorbell—and they all listen; they become tense, and they don't relax until Zoe has opened the door and told them that there's nothing to worry about."

"Could they be frightened —— I mean, if the police wanted to stop Paloma and ——"

"Paloma, I think, is the core of all the trouble. Men feel they'd like to see something of her—and how do you get to know a girl? You call on her. So they call on Paloma—and they don't get in. Maxie sees to that. For years they've kept out strangers. For years Paloma was no problem because she was too young. They want to go on that way—but they're beginning to understand that they can't. Or at any rate, not for much longer."

"But"—Teresa stared at him—"things can't be left like that! If Zoe's in trouble, something can be done. My godfather's one of those people who've got a lot of influence. I could go to him and explain that she's in trouble. But"—her eagerness faded—"there's nothing I can tell him—nothing definite. It's all guesswork. It's all mystery."

"Aren't you," Mark asked her, "going back on your first sensible resolution?"

"What was that?"

"To have nothing to do with any of it."

She studied him soberly. "Our positions seem to have changed," she remarked. "You began by wanting to draw me in; I was anxious to stay outside. Now I want to help, and you're beginning to sound discouraging. Why?"

He frowned. "Teresa, I think there's trouble ahead."

"For Zoe?"

"Perhaps for you too. I didn't want to bring you trouble."

Their eyes met in a long, deep, searching look. At the end of it, Teresa smiled gently.

"You didn't," she told him.

"I shouldn't have asked you to come and see David this morning. Lolly has made certain plans for your happiness, and if I don't constitute a threat, I serve as a warning: there's many a slip, she will decide, between the cup of betrothal and the lip of matrimony." He gave her a slow smile. "Will you bear in mind that I told you from the first what my intentions were?"

To have a respect for ourselves guides our morals; and to have a deference for others governs our manners. LAURENCE STERNE

"You said a lot of rather wild things."

"I said no more than the simple truth. What does my compatriot, Robert Burns, have to say on the subject?

'To see her is to love her
And love but her for ever.'

I saw you—and the rest will keep. For here"—his eyes were on the door—"here is your fiancé, standing in the doorway and looking dark in the brow. If he takes my advice, he'll come up to me, seize me by the collar, jerk me to my feet—it ought to be easy, he's stronger than I am—and throw me through the window. And I would make no resistance, because ——"

"Because?"

"Because you have given me no sign, no token. And until you do, how do I know whether you've heard what I've said to you so clearly?"

"Mark ——" she said suddenly.

"Hush!" He put out a hand and touched hers for an instant. "You can tell me on Sunday."

"Sunday?"

"Sunday is your birthday," he reminded her.

Then he had risen, and was nodding to Neville, who stood by the table and, giving no sign of having seen the other man, was speaking to Teresa.

"I see you're almost through lunch," he said.

"Sit down and have a drink," invited Mark.

"No. No, thanks," said Neville with an effort. "I haven't much time, Teresa; could you come with me and finish your lunch with me?"

"I could—but why don't you stay and have a drink?" asked Teresa.

It was odd, thought Mark, his heart filli anew with love, that a girl could be so inte ligent—and such a fool. "Please don't hesita to go," he said. "Your fiancé's right; lunc time can be short. I'll finish my coffee and g back to David." He gave her no time to repl he had walked round and was holding o her coat, and she had no option but to p it on. "Thank you for going to see him," said, "and thank you for the books and t fruit. It was very kind of you."

Nothing could have sounded more form more correct, but for one second Nevill eyes rested on the speaker with open hatre Then he was walking out with Teresa's ha under his arm.

They drove without speaking: he was thin ing of what he was going to say; Teresa w absorbed in all that had happened that mor ing. A great deal had occurred, but she w still unwilling to look too closely at her o reactions.

"That fellow," came savagely from Nevil "wants dealing with. Why do you allow him take up your time? Don't you see what h after? He's after you. The fact that you're e gaged to somebody else wouldn't mean thing to a man of his sort. But if he does understand the decencies, surely you do. W do you think I feel like when I think of you the bedroom—yes, it was the bedroom—o man, and in that house? You should ne have entered the place. Anybody but y would have seen at once what a shady they are."

"How do you know?" Teresa's voice cool.

"Because I went in and saw them, th how. I rang the bell and a woman came to door—a dark, foreign woman who ——"

"My uncle's wife," came coldly from Tere

"Well, I suppose so. I didn't inquire. I t her who I was, and I found out where y were. And while she was telling me, someb came rushing downstairs—a girl, a w looking sort of girl—and threw herself i the arms of a stocky fellow with one arm. I lover, I shouldn't be surprised."

"Her father," said Teresa. "Please go o

The iciness of her tone pulled him up. gave a swift glance at her, and his next wo were quieter.

"I'm sorry. I was angry. But I didn't the setup in the house. This Tudor—a r who doesn't mind living in a place like t can't be called exactly fastidious. And doing his best to get under my skin." He s another rapid glance at Teresa. "And wh can't get over is the astounding fact that actually went to that house again and —

Teresa had no time to answer; they reached Neville's club. Neville went awa make arrangements for lunch, and Teresa left alone on an enormous sofa in the lou to await his return. This was a good oppo nity, she realized, to examine her position

Teresa examined it. She was engaged marry Neville. She thought him a good and she thought herself capable of ma him a good wife. They had her mother's proval; looking back with eyes whose f seemed suddenly to have changed, Teresa for the first time how much her engage owed to her mother's skillful handling of preliminaries. Her mother had believed would be happy with Neville, and as she self felt affectionate toward him, she agreed to marry him—and had never had slightest doubt that she was doing the r the wise thing.

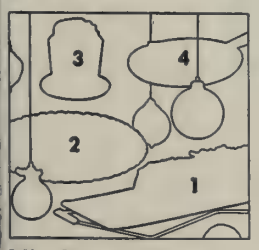
Until she met Mark Tudor.

And what, Teresa asked herself, figh for honesty, what had happened then?

Her feelings about Neville had not, all, changed; she still thought him g sound, reliable and the kind of man e sensible girl would be glad to marry. Bu no longer wanted to marry him.

And now?

Neville had asked a question and he h right to a reassuring answer. She had p ised to marry him; she was waiting nov him to ask her—as he would without d ask her—to see no more of Mark Tudor



A fog of depression settled on her. tried to think of Neville, but nothing but a memory of Mark's gently smiling face. His eyes were, as always, faintly amused—he seemed to be waiting for her to make her decision.

Neville entered the lounge and touched her shoulder, and she started and stared at him in bewilderment. They walked into the dining room. Neville ordered coffee for Teresa and lunch for himself. Teresa waited and braced herself for what was coming.

But when he spoke at last, there was a note in his voice which she had never heard before, and which cleared her mind, suddenly, of all sensations except anger. She had expected reproaches, appeals, arguments—but she had not expected him to adopt a hectoring, almost bullying attitude.

"About this fellow," he said without preliminary. "This Tudor. I think we'd better put our cards on the table. When a man puts a ring on a girl's finger he expects to get some peace of mind about the relationship between them. He doesn't—and God knows I didn't—expect any stray clown to put a spell on her." He stared across at her. "And what I want to say is this: a man who butts in between an engaged couple is an outsider and ought to be told so without delay. I can tell him—or you can. Which is it to be?"

"You, obviously," said Teresa coldly, "because you think so, and I don't."

"You mean you—you actually like him?"

"Yes. I like him." Teresa's voice was quiet. "I think he's intelligent and I also think he's honest. But I'm willing to agree that I shouldn't have allowed him to make you uneasy."

"Well, that's something. Thank you for the crumbs. And are you willing to agree that as my fiancée, you owe it to me to keep other men at a distance?"

"Yes; I agree that ——"

"Then I'll say no more." Neville sat back with a look of relief. "Now we know where we are. You tell him to leave you alone, and if he shows any disposition to go on bothering you, let me deal with him. But I think you'll find that before your mother gets back, he'll get out of the way—and fast."

She gave him a long, searching look, and saw his color darken. She knew that he feared Mark, and he feared his own ability to deal with him—and he was going to delay the crisis until he could be certain that Coralie was present to bolster him up.

She said no more. They rose at the conclusion of the meal, and he drove her to the station and she took the first train home.

Teresa's birthday began uneventfully. The sun shone, the servants came with their modest gifts, the gardener brought in a fragrant bunch of flowers, and Lolly produced a bulky parcel.

"It's beautiful," said Teresa, holding up the pea-green sweater. "I shall wear it next week to welcome mother."

"Next week? This week. She'll be home in six days."

"Oh." A startled look came into Teresa's eyes. "Has the time really gone so fast?"

"Well, it's gone; fast or slow, I wouldn't know," said Lolly. "What are you going to do today?"

"I thought I'd go into Brighton and give Lawrence a surprise, and thank him for his check."

"Neville will be coming, I suppose?"

"Yes; he's coming to dinner. He rang up last night."

"Will you be home for lunch?"

"No. If Lawrence's housekeeper won't cook something extra for me, I'll persuade him to take me out."

Teresa got off the bus at Brighton, crossed over to a taxi and directed the driver to Lawrence's house. The taxi drew up in front of the building. She got out—and saw immediately in front of the taxi a sports car, long and low and shabby. In it were two figures, one tall, one small.

Mark got out of his car and came toward her, his face almost lost behind the tall sheaf of roses he carried. "Happy birthday." He took her hand, held it to his cheek and stood smiling down at her. "Shall I sing it on this lovely day?" he asked, and raised his voice in a pleasing tenor. "Happy birthday to yoo-oo happy —— David," he called, "come and sa happy birthday to Teresa."

David, scrambling eagerly out of the ca ran up to Teresa and held out a small an sticky package. "Happy birfday," he saic "That's from me. It's a surprise."

Teresa took the parcel and smiled at th child. "Can I open it now?"

"'Course; it's yours. It'll break if you dro it," warned David.

She unwrapped the paper; inside was small, very small china goose. She held i gently in her hand. "It's simply lovely," sh said. "Thank you, David. Has it got a name?"

"Not yet. You give it one," invited David "Let's call it Smoocher."

"All right; Smoocher it is." Teresa looke up at Mark. "How did you know it was m birthday?"

"Intuition. And the rest was intuition too What, I asked David here, was a girl likely t do on a lovely birthday morning? She'd lik to see the sparkling sea, and see her godfathe at the same time, wouldn't she? The fact tha we're here is of course pure coincidence David and I thought it would be wonderful t drive down and get a breath of sea air."

"You shouldn't have come," said Teresa

"You mean I mustn't bring David dow here for sea air?" He took her hand and drev her gently toward the car. "Come on," h said. "We'll find a warm spot on the beac and then David can build castles while I— well, perhaps I'll build castles, too, but nc sand ones."

"I want to see my godfather."

"And so you shall. But you've got some thing serious to say to me, and you can't sa it here. Perhaps you're going to dismiss me and when I weep, I want to weep in some quiet spot and not on this busy street. Come."

He led her to the car; they got in and drove away from Brighton, following the coast road David sat between them, pointing eagerly a the sea came now and then into view.

They found a quiet stretch of beach, empty save for one or two strollers exercising thei dogs. Mark spread a rug, and he and Teresa sat down. David, spade and bucket in hand found a rock, and a small warm pool not fa away, and began to dig energetically.

Teresa lay back and gave herself up to the stillness and the warmth of the day. She was here and so was Mark; it would be perhaps the last time they would meet before the storm clouds broke. For the moment they were alone on a stretch of golden sand, with blue-gray sea before them and a pale blue sky above. They were here, and it was quiet and infinitely peaceful, infinitely removed from hard words and difficult decisions. They would say what they had to say—in a little while.

Mark, however, was sitting upright beside her, alert and expectant. "Well, go on," he urged at last. "Say it. You've spent the last days thinking—and now you want to tell me what you've thought about."

"Presently." Teresa's voice was dreamy.

"No; now." He slipped a hand under her shoulders and lifted her gently to a sitting position. "We can't enjoy the nice sunshine if we've got any feeling of guilt about being here. For myself, I feel nothing but pleasure. You, far from feeling happy, are rehearsing your big speech. Well, off you go."

"You know it already."

"Of course. It isn't a very original speech. It's been made before and it'll be made again: 'Sir, leave me, I beg; my betrothed e'en now cometh o'er the mountain, and he will slay thee.' How did he say he'd do it?" he asked with interest. "Was he going to throw me to the lions, or was he going to seize my shirt front and shake me until my teeth rattle, and then throw me to the ground? He could too; strong chap, is Neville. And in many ways, a decent chap; I don't for a moment blame you for allowing yourself to be talked into becoming engaged to him ——"

"Please stop," broke in Teresa. She stared at the calm, still sea. "I like you very much, Mark. But I should never have let you say some of the things you did say, and ——"

"Half a moment." Mark held up a hand. "How could you have prevented me from saying anything?"

"I needn't have listened. Don't let's pretend about this; if a girl wants to get rid of a man, there are lots of ways in which she can do it."

"Not really," said Mark, and his voice was quiet. "Not really, Teresa, my darling. A man in love—and I'm in love—has a lot he wants to get off his chest, and if he's in earnest, it would take more than a gentle girl like yourself to stop him."

"And in other circumstances, a girl would have to listen to him. But I'm engaged, Mark, and ——" She paused.

"Look." Mark turned to face her. "You and a man become engaged, and you say you'll marry—in due course. Between the putting on of the ring and the ceremony at the altar, there's usually a waiting period. And if, during that period, a third party makes his appearance, he has to be taken seriously. If he's merely a nuisance, as a rule he knows it—and he gives up trying. But if he thinks that the girl he loves is unawakened, that she gave her word before she knew what she was doing, that she drifted into an engagement because everybody round her seemed to expect it—then the man constitutes a real threat. Why? Not because the girl is disloyal; not because she's a weak character—but simply because deep down, she knows that her own feelings aren't secure . . . aren't sure." He put out a hand and gently took one of Teresa's. "There's only one thing wrong with Neville, and that's his insensitiveness. He's so busy watching me that he hasn't bothered to shift his glance and take a look at you—and that's where I have an advantage, because I've looked at you all the time. I've seen Neville enter a room after three days' absence from you. You offer your cheek—because strangers are present and a display of affection is not good form. He sees another man, and he thinks it a good time to declare his position; he turns your lips to his and puts his own on them. It's a declaration: This woman is mine. And the woman? She remains as cool, as unmoved as though he had merely touched her cheek. Affection? Yes. Love? My word, no! After three days away from you, a man in love would have drawn you out of the room and given himself—and you—a few shaking seconds in his arms. Neville didn't move you—because he couldn't. Because you don't love him. I can move you. How do I know? I know the signs because I feel them in myself. When I take your hand like this, I can see the pulse—there, in the wrist. Racing, just as mine is racing. I hear your voice, and know it isn't steady, just as mine isn't. And because I know these things, I know that you feel—a little, just a little—of what I feel."

Teresa's voice trembled. "You—you sound so—so sure."

"I am sure. I love you, Teresa."

"But—but you can't. You saw me for the first time about a week ago."

"And I haven't got eyes? Ears? Senses?"

"They could mislead you."

"Never. Shall I tell you why? Because love isn't blind; love is entirely clear-eyed and clearheaded. Every blade of grass looks greener, every flower looks more beautiful. If that line's not very original, it's true. This beach—the sands are pure gold. The sky is blue—bluer than any sky has ever been. Is that seeing less—or seeing more?"

"Is it seeing too much?"

"No. It's the way life should look all the time—and doesn't. We accept beauty without ever really seeing it, and then something like this happens and the mist of everyday dissolves—and I see . . . you. I see truth in your eyes, I see gentleness in your bearing. What else do I see? I see hands, here in my own, that are white and delicate. I see hair of spun gold—do you know that it's almost the same color as this lovely sand? I see your skin, pale and clear—but healthy withal. I see your lips, soft and —— Perhaps I'd better not think about your lips. Teresa, Teresa, oh Teresa, I love you so much." He turned in a swift movement and lay on the sand, his head resting in her lap, her hand held to his cheek. "I'm so glad," he said dreamily, "I'm so very, very glad I didn't meet you before. I used to wonder what was the matter with me—so many lovely girls, and no reaction from me. I was waiting for you. And I'm not sorry that I didn't meet you when I was twenty or twenty-five or even thirty. At twenty I was going to reform the world, and I think I would have bored you. At twenty-five I was certain that I knew everything there was to know about everything that was really important: food, wine, dealing with headwaiters, getting the best tables and escorting the most photogenic blondes. That was a bad stage, Teresa, and I'm glad you didn't come in just then. And at thirty? I was rather lonely at thirty; I would have welcomed you—but you knew exactly when to appear. You waited until my inner vision had fashioned a replica of you—you, exactly as you are. Teresa, marry me, please, my darling—and soon. I'm not fit to touch you, but I'll love you—humbly—until I die. And I'll try to become anything you wish."

"I like you," said Teresa gently, "exactly as you are."

He rolled over and stared up at her. "You mean that?"

"You said you saw truth in my eyes. I see truth in yours," she told him. "And I feel a kind of strength in you that I never felt before in anybody. With you, beside you, I feel completely safe."

"Bless you," said Mark. "Oh, bless you, Teresa."

"I feel safe—and happy. And in some curious way, awake. I don't see, as you seem to see, bluer skies or more beautiful flowers, but I seem to be looking back over my life and wondering whether I could have been mad—or asleep—or just stupid. It doesn't seem possible that I ever imagined I could marry anybody without feeling . . . this." She smiled at him. "Perhaps it's because I've—I've never met anybody like you before."

Ask any WOMAN

By Marcelene Cox

Wife, from the next room, about to show new hat to husband: "Honey, do you love me?"

Husband: "Yes, why?"

Wife: "I just wondered if you're in a good mood?"

Small daughter, listening in: "She wants to know if you're in a good mood to get ready for a bad mood."

Then there's the woman who requested her husband to help her remember to ask a friend what it was she had forgotten.

She was the kind of woman who met and came through all emergencies with the stamina of an apple that manages to cling to an unsprayed tree.

It often seems that the greatest disgrace in modern America is to be known as a parent who doesn't give his child security.

In the average household, the mere putting on of eggs to boil for three minutes will scatter a family faster than a tornado does a hamlet.

GRAVY MASTER
MERRY CHRISTMAS

"Do you understand"—his voice was slow and of deadly seriousness—"do you understand that I will love you until I die?"

She bent and put her lips briefly to his. "I think I understand," she said gently, "because I know that nothing can ever make me forget you. Nothing, ever again. I don't know"—her voice trembled—"I don't know what will happen, or even whether we can marry—but I know that nothing like this moment has ever happened to me before, and never will again. Mark ——"

Mark put a hand on her lips. "Leave it at that—for the moment," he begged. "Just for this one day—please, my darling. I love you with all my heart—and you love me."

His lips were on hers. The place, the time were alike forgotten. When his arms came around her, Teresa surrendered to them without thought, without reservation.

When he released her, she saw that things had not changed outwardly: the beach, the sea, the sunshine were there; David was still digging. Nothing was changed outwardly—and yet Teresa knew that for her nothing would ever be the same again. This man beside her had awakened in her a tumult of feeling greater than she had ever experienced. Shaken, giddy, she could yet feel a surge of pure happiness sweeping through her.

"You're twenty-four today," said Mark, out of a long silence, "and this is your first love—and your last. Are you happy?"

"Yes."

She was happy. The day went on and she did not think of time; she thought only of the man who had come into her life and changed it forever. They spoke little, but their silences were easy, relaxed. They played with David; they ran races and built castles. They bought lunch and ate it on the beach. As the afternoon drew to a close, they drove slowly back to London, David's head drooping drowsily now on Teresa's, now on Mark's arm.

"This is the last time," said Mark, looking down at the boy, "that he'll be going to bed at your uncle's house."

Teresa turned to him in surprise. "Why?"

"Because we're leaving."

"But where are you going?"

"To a flat in Abbott Square, which I shall take you to see—but not this evening. This evening I shall take you home—and then I'm going to talk to Lolly."

"Talk to Lolly?" There was apprehension in her voice.

"Yes. In the absence of your mother."

"My mother ——" The apprehension was more evident now, and Mark gave her a brief but searching glance.

"You're very fond of her, aren't you?"

"Of course. She's my mother. She—she won't like this," said Teresa slowly.

"Because Neville was her candidate? He wasn't the man for you—and I am." He threw her another glance, this time a smiling one. "There's so much about me that you don't know. I always imagined women were curious—and yet you ask so few questions. I might be keeping all kinds of sinister knowledge from you."

"Are you?"

"No. Not sinister. There's one fact I've kept from you. It's nothing that can affect what you feel or what I feel."

"Then it isn't important. Do you want to tell me?"

"Not yet. You'll have to know soon—but today is for . . . other things. Agreed?"

"Agreed."

They put David to bed and left him in Maxie's care. With Mark's voice soothing her fears, nothing seemed very difficult. He was strong in a way that Neville, she knew now, had never been strong; she could lean on him, she could have utter confidence in his ability to smooth matters out; she could leave everything safely in his hands.

Even the sight of her godfather's car standing in the drive of the cottage did not greatly disturb her newly found confidence. Lawrence would understand.

In the drawing room they came face to face with Lolly and Sir Lawrence—and there was a heavy silence in the room.

"I don't need to ask," said Lolly at last, "what's happened. One has only to look. I've had," she added bitterly, "hell's own day. I honestly don't understand, Teresa, how you could ——"

"Won't you," put in Mark quietly, "say it all to me?"

"What is there to say? It's too late," said Lolly.

"It really is too late," said Teresa. "I'm sorry it's happened this way, but . . . I love him very much."

"My dear"—Sir Lawrence's voice was heavy—"if you will allow me to speak to him ——"

Mark walked to the door and opened it and smiled at Teresa. "Please," he begged. "I'll explain to Sir Lawrence, and you can talk to Lolly. Only a few minutes."

He closed the door behind them and faced the old man. Sir Lawrence, hands clasped behind his back, head bent, was walking up and down the room restlessly. Presently he stopped and looked at the younger man, with wonder growing slowly on his face.

DADDY'S TURN

By L. V. FRANCIS

Rockaby, Cheryl. (Rocking's taboo!
It may create some complex in you.)
But if this practice puts you to sleep,
Daddy may then his sanity keep!

Here, my dear Cheryl, suck on your thumb.
This habit, too, is frowned on by some.
But, while you suck, you surely can't howl!
Daddy is ready to throw in the towel!

Daddy's delinquent. He has no choice.
His nerves can*not* compete with your voice.
Daddy's remiss. The die is now cast.
In our big bed, you slumber at last!

"My word," he said slowly at last, "but you're like your mother."

"You knew her?"

"I knew them all—all three girls. They were the prettiest trio in Sussex. And your mother was the loveliest of the three. She died, Lolly told me."

"Yes."

"Well, I'm sorry." Sir Lawrence stared unseeingly at a point beyond Mark. "I'm sorry. I was only thirty at the time, and she was seventeen—and it was winter. We used to go skating. We used to glide over the ice ——"

"Go on," said Mark softly.

"It was a close thing." Sir Lawrence spoke dreamily. "It was a very close thing. She was looking up at me, and her hands were in mine, and she looked like an angel, and I opened my mouth and I was going to tell her so—tell her that and who knows how much more? And then ——"

"And then?"

"Then we both went down with an almighty crash," Sir Lawrence told him. "I was all right, but her wrist was broken. They took her away—and the next time we met, she had a husband and I had a wife. But it was a close thing; a very close thing."

Mark smiled. "And so instead of being my father, you turned out to be my future godfather," he said. "That being so, sir, you ought to be on my side in this little matter of Teresa's engagement."

Sir Lawrence stared at him, his expressio slowly hardening. "Little matter?" he r peated.

"Little matter." Mark spoke firmly. "Sl made a mistake. She loves me; I love her ve dearly. I can look after her, and I think I ca make her happy."

"I've no doubt you can. But you don know what you're doing," said Sir Lawren moodily. "There's going to be trouble- Teresa's mother."

"I hope we shall be able to make her see th this is for Teresa's happiness."

Sir Lawrence had turned and was gazin out the window. When he faced Mark agai his face looked older and rather haggard.

"Lolly asked me to talk to you. She wante to stop this before it went too far. She came t me and I agreed to explain one or two thing agreed to ——" He broke off. "Look," he sa more abruptly. "It's no good my moralizing catechizing. I'll give you a few facts and th you'll see how matters stand. Sit down."

"Do you mind if I stand?"

"As you like. Well, this begins a long wa back. Teresa's father was my greatest frien and I knew him, I think, as well as anybody the world. He was a thoroughly good ma but—like Teresa—he was a bit too gentle, a b too defenseless, a bit too soft when it came dealing with harsh realities. Well, he marrie Teresa's mother had always lived with h brother Hubert, and their combined i comes ——"

"I know," put in Mark quietly. "Four hu dred to him, eight hundred to her."

"Hubert couldn't get on on four hundre and he came down to the cottage and put in strong bid for all or part of his sister's share the money. She refused. Her first refusal w abrupt enough to make her husband a bit u happy; a little piece of the veil lifted—but n much. Then finally Hubert saw it was no u and—to spite his sister, or to find someboc who'd look after him—he married the woma who cooked for him and who'd also been h mistress. Then he came down to the cotta and told his sister what he'd done. There was scene in which she was transformed, befo her husband's eyes, from a pretty little, clin ing, devoted wife into an ugly, spiteful, incred ibly vindictive creature, hardly recognizable happened to be there at the time—otherwise wouldn't expect to be able to make you unde stand what an appalling shock the sight wa It was no surprise to her brother—it was cle that they'd got used to scenes of that kind- but to her husband ——" Sir Lawrence pause and looked unhappily at the younger man, ar shook his head. "It's no use," he went on. was going to tell you that to her husband was a blow from which he never really reco ered. It's true, but why should you believe it

"Was he so . . . unrealistic?"

"No, that's not the word. He was vulne able—too vulnerable by half. I'm not going argue about whether a man—a strong, intel gent man—should have been as vulnerable that. But he loved her, and he believed she w one thing—and under stress she showed th she was another. He couldn't get the pictu out of his mind. And Teresa's like hi Teresa ——"

"Do you mean to tell me that Teresa h lived in this house with her mother all the years without ——"

"—— without knowing that her moth has a bad temper? No, certainly not. But I c tell you that in all that time her mother h never exhibited the incredibly ugly side sh showed her husband. You needn't try to tell m that it's impossible; it's true. Lolly has made her life's work to stand between Teresa ar her mother; to see that Coralie got enough her own way to prevent her from—from goi over the edge again." He took out a handke chief and drew it across his brow. "Ov twenty years," he said slowly, "but I swear you that I still remember it." He saw Mark frown, and gave a grim smile. "You think I exaggerating, don't you?" he said. "You thi I'm a fussy old fool making a lot out nothing. You don't believe a word of this

"Exhibitions of bad temper are never plea ant to watch. Why should Lady Thurlo be ——"

"You've never seen Teresa's mother, have you?"

"No."

"Well, when she was young, she looked just as Teresa looks now—only she was even more fragile-looking; even more delicate-looking; even more gentle and graceful. With Teresa, all this comes from within. But her mother's appearance was purely an exterior. There was nothing pretty below it. You were right when you said that a display of wicked temper is never pretty to watch—but there are degrees of ugliness. The shocking part of Coralie's display was its swing from all that's loveliest in a woman to all that's ugliest. I saw it, and it didn't do me any good—and I wasn't her husband and I wasn't deeply, trustingly in love with her. To Teresa's father it was a—a shocking revelation, and it was to save his daughter from a similar experience that he asked Lolly to come and live here and—and keep the peace as far as possible. And that's what Lolly's done—and whether you agree with the arrangement or whether you don't, it's worked. And if at this stage you turn up and upset the work of over twenty years ——" He stopped and then ended abruptly, "Well, there it is; I've told you, and you don't agree with a blasted word of it, I suppose."

"I'm going to marry Teresa," said Mark slowly.

"And you fully understand what will happen when her mother learns that her plans have come to nothing? Four years of planning, choosing a man, working patiently, secretly—and successfully—to get Teresa to agree to marrying him."

"She'll make another scene," Mark told him. "She'll go over the edge again; and we'll be treated to the sight of a lovely woman transfigured with rage. And so," ended Mark with raised eyebrows, "what?"

Sir Lawrence stared at him. "You take it very lightly." Anger sounded for the first time in the old man's voice. "Do you want Teresa to go through what her father went through?"

"She won't," said Mark. "Her father took it alone. Teresa'll have me with her. What possible good can come, at this stage, of keeping from her the knowledge that her mother can look and behave like a hellcat? When she was younger, it was necessary to stave off unpleasant revelations. It preserved the peace and happiness of the household, and it enabled her to grow up without shadows—and so a certain measure of protection was right and proper. But now? She's a grown woman, and not a weak one."

"And so you see no need to protect her?"

"I shall spend the rest of my life trying to make her happy—but I don't feel for a moment that she'll need to be walled off from real life. She's got to look—and see. Seeing, she's got to judge. Although I hope Lady Thurloe will like me, I shan't be unduly depressed if she shows any disapproval. In fact, I won't really mind if she screams the place down. If you were going to ask me to withdraw merely in order to let the tigress go on sleeping—I'm sorry."

"You won't see it from Teresa's point of view?"

"If you think she loves her mother only because she's seen her sugar side up all these years, I respectfully submit that you're wrong. In any case, the need for protection is past."

"You're talking sense, but good sense doesn't cover every situation. Coralie won't stand aside and see her candidate defeated."

"Please don't worry, sir; I'm certain we can work it out."

"If you'd seen Neville's face an hour ago, you wouldn't have thought so. He rang up before leaving town, to speak to Teresa. She wasn't here. He came down. She wasn't here. He drove out to my house, passing me on the way. She wasn't there. He came back. She wasn't here."

"I must give him my address," said Mark.

"He knows it."

"I'm not at Grosvenor Drive any longer."

"You're not? Well, I'm glad to hear that." The door opened, and he went forward to meet Teresa and Lolly. "D'you hear that, Lolly? He's not living at Hubert's any more; that's one good thing, anyhow."

Lolly did not appear to be listening. "There's a car," she said. "Neville's back. We came in here ——"

"Quite right," said Sir Lawrence. "We've got to have this out, I suppose."

The four in the room waited and listened; a car door banged, and footsteps sounded on the steps, in the hall. Teresa made a restless movement and Mark, putting out a hand, took one of hers and held it in a firm grasp. She smiled at him—a rather tremulous smile—and then faced the door, ready to meet Neville.

The door opened—but it was not Neville who stood on the threshold. Coralie, in a neat suit, a fur across her shoulders, came with her graceful walk into the room. She had a smile for Lolly and Sir Lawrence, a faint puzzled uplifting of the brows for Mark; then she had caught Teresa in a soft embrace.

"Darling," she said, "I came home—as a surprise. Happy birthday."

Coralie Thurloe had in the past made a great many effective entrances; none of them, however, had had as shattering an effect as her appearance before the unprepared quartet in the drawing room.

Teresa, muffled in her mother's furs, had the advantage of being able to conceal her first feelings of dismay; Lolly and Sir Lawrence were less fortunate, and Coralie had time to draw some interesting conclusions from their confusion.

Mark alone remained unmoved. He had heard much of Coralie, and now she was before him. He let his gaze rest frankly upon her, and took in her beauty, her poise, her all-but-natural charm. Certain things about her surprised him: he had not expected the look of youth and freshness.

Coralie, in her turn, noted Mark's height and ease of manner and quiet air of authority. She did not know who he was or why he was in her drawing room—but she saw that he had an air of being perfectly at home there.

In a few moments Sir Lawrence had recovered his poise. "Nice to see you back, Coralie," he said. "Will you allow me to present a young friend of mine? Mark Tudor. Son of one of m'old flames—Mary Grant. You must have heard of the three Grant sisters; they were local beauties."

"Indeed I have." Coralie extended a hand to Mark. "They lived near some friends of mine who used to mention them frequently. How d'you do?"

Mark bowed over her hand and awarded her full marks for deportment; he was, he knew, going to come in for some scratching—but not until she was ready.

"Lily"—she was bending to kiss Lolly's cheek—"it's lovely to be back. I kept thinking of Teresa's birthday, and wishing I could be here for it—and so I decided suddenly that I'd come home. And I did. Where's Neville? Isn't he dining here?"

"Yes. He went to fetch Lawrence, and passed him on the way," lied Lolly stolidly. "He'll be back presently. Lawrence and Mr. Tudor," she added, "are leaving."

"Oh—no! Won't you both stay and dine?" said Coralie.

"No; very good of you, very good indeed," said Sir Lawrence hastily, "but got to get back. Come 'long, young feller; we've got to be going. 'By, Coralie; 'by, Lolly, my dear. Teresa, come and see us out."

He ushered Mark and Teresa swiftly out of the house, and then he took out a large handkerchief and wiped his brow. "Close thing," he remarked. "Now, then, you two, I'll give you three minutes to make your farewells; no more." He strode away to his car, and they looked after him with a smile.

"Saved the day," said Mark. "But we've only got three minutes." He enfolded Teresa in his arms. "Darling Teresa," he murmured, "shall we go back now and have it out?"

"No. Not now," said Teresa. "Tomorrow. Neville will come back tonight and ——"

"I don't want you to have to see him alone."

"I've got to, Mark. This is something I've got to do myself. You don't know mother. She needs—well, a special approach."

Mark held her at arm's length and studied her for a few moments. "If she takes it badly?" he asked slowly. "Sir Lawrence hinted that she might."

"She's fond of Neville, and she'll be disappointed—but she'll come round. She knows, I think, that I was never entirely sure about Neville."

"And you're sure about me?"

Teresa walked forward into his arms and laid her head on his chest. "I love you," she said steadily. "I'm sorry it happened so—so fast and so suddenly, because it makes us look as though we . . . as though we lost our heads. But I love you and I want to spend the rest of my life with you, and nothing matters any more—much—except you. I hope mother will be happy, and I hope Lolly won't be disappointed—but it won't make any difference in the end. I love you."

He did not speak. Gently, he put his lips on hers and held her close to his heart. Sir Lawrence, turning to urge them to hurry, changed mind and remained silent; his eyes, resting them, were full of affection, but there were ases of worry on his brow.

Teresa stood on the drive to watch them go, d then went slowly back into the house. She nd her mother alone in the drawing room, r hat, her fur and gloves thrown on a chair.

"Where's Lolly?" Teresa asked.

"Gone to see about an extra place at dinner. rling, who was that man?"

"Mark Tudor."

"Why should Lawrence suddenly produce n? It was odd, I thought, to bring him on a thday call. Unless, of course, he's staying h him."

"No, he isn't," said Teresa. "As a matter of t ——"

She paused. A car had driven up to the use, and Teresa, who had not looked forrd to Neville's coming, felt grateful at least the timeliness of his arrival. She had felt rself, a moment ago, equal to explaining the uation to her mother—but with Mark's deerture, something of her courage had evapoed. She felt tired, and a little more than prehensive; something in her mother's voice d disturbed her: a note of hardness below casual questions. It wasn't, thought resa, going to be too smooth.

She decided, suddenly, that she would put explanations until Mark could be with . She did not think that Neville would ce the issue—not this evening.

When the door opened to admit Neville, wever, he greeted Coralie with an obvious ort. Then his eyes, black with anger, rested Teresa.

"I've been looking for you," he said. lappy birthday—if it isn't too late."

"It isn't too late. Thank you," said Teresa. His eyes were on her hand, and he saw that ring was still on her finger; and he saw, p, from her look that she would have taken off—if she had remembered. For the first he, Teresa knew what he was feeling. Before could stop herself, she had gone forward d put her hands in his.

"I'm sorry, Neville," she said gently. "I'm—an only say I'm sorry."

He drew his hands away and she saw that he s suffering more anger than pain. Then ralie was speaking in a distressed voice.

"Have you two quarreled?"

"Not yet," said Neville, without taking his es from Teresa. "And when there's anything be said, it won't be said between Teresa and self. There's ——"

"Please, Neville!" Coralie held up a slender nd. "I don't know what sort of misundernding has arisen between you, but it can be ked over tomorrow."

"I'm not going to sit down to dinner preding that everything's fine and rosy," broke Neville abruptly. "I'm not in a social mood. e spent the last few hours chasing my tail d if I can't have it out now with Teresa, I'll me back tomorrow."

He strode to the door, opened it and turned a last look at Teresa.

"Don't let yourself go quite overboard," he rned her. "There are a few things you ought know about him first, and perhaps some of m will jerk you out of your dreams."

eresa and her mother stood unmoving as sounds of the car died away. Then Coralie ung slowly round to face her daughter, and sed her hands helplessly.

"Have I gone mad?" she asked. "Or has erybody else? Teresa, what is all this about?"

Teresa raised calm eyes to her mother's. m not going to marry Neville," she said. "I n't love him. I'm sorry I found it out so e—but it isn't too late, mother."

"Teresa, what has come over you? And o ——" Coralie stopped and her eyes narwed. "This man Lawrence brought ——"

"Yes," said Teresa, and waited.

"Are you telling me," Coralie asked, "that the mere few days that I was away, you met s man and decided to break your engagent to Neville?"

"Yes."

"You—you mean that you imagine you are love with this—this entire stranger?"

"I don't imagine it. I am in love with him," d Teresa.

Coralie walked slowly across the room to a table in the corner and poured herself out a drink. "How do you know?"

"Because I feel so—so certain about it all," Teresa told her mother. "With Neville, I was never sure. I liked him, I felt he would make a good husband and I thought that my—my lack of feeling for him was some kind of lack in myself. But when I met Mark—from the first moment, I felt something. Not love, at first; just curiosity, and then a sort of —— I can't put it into words," she ended helplessly.

"Well, try." Coralie spoke coldly. "I've got to know the whole story, surely?"

"If you can just try to trust me—I mean trust me to know my own feelings ——"

"My dear Teresa"—from coldness, Coralie's voice was now edged with contempt—"I've seen infatuated girls before. If you let a man like Neville go for the sake of a total stranger who's been glib enough to sweep you off your feet, you'll be insane. Crazy. What sort of a man can he be, to come near you at all when you're engaged to someone else? Or didn't you tell him?"

"He knew."

"And you can admire, look up to, love a man who could do that?"

"Need we argue about it?"

"Argue? Do you expect me to come home and see all my plans, all your plans in ruins, and simply offer my congratulations? Do you expect me to tell Neville that we're sorry, but you met a man last week you think you'd rather marry? Good heavens, Teresa, people can't do these things! Who is this man? What do you know about him—except that Lawrence knew his mother? Where does he come from? What has he to offer you? What ——"

She stopped. The door had opened, and Lolly had come into the room. Teresa had a curious feeling that she had been standing outside the door waiting for a suitable moment to interrupt, and her heart lifted in gratitude.

"I suppose you know what's been going on?" Coralie asked her as she entered.

"I don't know much," said Lolly. "If you're going to ask my opinion, I like him."

"Can you tell me anything at all about him?"

"Not much. Except he wanted Teresa and he got her. Must be something in him, wouldn't you say?"

"Every plausible schemer since the world began," said Coralie, "has been able to work on women. Has it struck anybody that Teresa is rather a good match?"

"I don't quite honestly think he's had time to cook up any dirty motives," said Lolly. "This is one of those cases you read about, when they take one look and go into a daze. And if you ask me," she proceeded without pause, "the most sensible thing for you to do, Coralie, is to meet Mark Tudor and see what you think of him."

"I have seen Mark Tudor, and I have no wish to talk to him," said Coralie. "What I want to do is get Teresa back to her right senses."

"Perhaps Neville will do that," suggested Lolly. "For the moment, I've cooked a very fine birthday dinner and it isn't going to be improved by neglect—so hadn't we better think about eating?"

Coralie gathered together her things. "If you'll forgive me," she said, "I'd rather not pretend that this is a small matter which we can all ignore. Will you have something sent up to my room?"

"If you prefer it," said Lolly. "But it's Teresa's birthday and ——"

" —— and I gave up my cruise and came home to see her—and she has made it clear that I might just as well have stayed away," said Coralie coldly. "So I may as well go to my room. Good night."

When Teresa got into bed that night and settled herself against the pillows, the telephone gave a ring and then Mark's voice was sounding in her ears.

"Good timing?" he asked. "I pictured you just in bed."

"I love you," said Teresa.

"I know. I knew all the time. Has your mother loosed all her fury?"

"She's disappointed, and I suppose she's angry, but ——"

"Then the worst is to come. I'm glad. I want to be with you. Will you promise to head off any crisis until I come?"

"Yes—but why should you expect a crisis?"

"One of the most dangerous creatures in all nature," said Mark, "is a mother going into action for her young. There's only one force more lethal, and that's a woman deprived of something she worked for and succeeded in not getting. Your mother will make trouble; will you believe that, my darling Teresa?"

"She might make a scene. But when she knows that my mind is made up, she'll understand that she can't do anything."

"And that's the point at which the curtain will rise on the big scene. And now forget everything but the fact that I love you with all my heart and that in future you're mine and not your mother's. Close your eyes; I'm going to kiss you."

Teresa closed her eyes.

She slept late. When she went downstairs to the small, sunny room in which she and her mother always breakfasted, she paused for a moment on the threshold, her eyes taking in the pleasant picture within.

Her mother sat on a high-backed chair drawn up to the oval table; she wore a pale pink housecoat with an immensely full skirt that billowed round her as she sat. The table was agleam with silver—the tall coffeepot, the milk and cream jugs, the sugar bowl. The china was pale green, the tablecloth a green of a slightly darker shade. The sun shone in through the long open window; outside, the grass lay under a faint haze; the hum of a mowing machine sounded in the distance. At one end of the table lay a neat pile of morning papers and new magazines; as Teresa came in, Coralie folded the newspaper she had been reading, and tilted a cheek for Teresa to kiss.

"Did you sleep well, darling?" she asked.

"Beautifully, thank you, mother. Where's Lolly?"

"She's shopping in Brighton."

Teresa helped herself to coffee and put two slices of bread into the toaster; she was outwardly calm, but within she was reassessing the peaceful scene. This room, the breakfast, her mother might look the same—but Lolly did not go shopping in Brighton at this time of the morning; she went—if she went at all—in the afternoon, when the household matters had been arranged.

"That's unusual, isn't it?" she asked.

"Unusual?" Her mother's glance, faintly surprised, met hers over a large and glossy magazine. "Lolly going shopping?"

"If she wants to shop in the morning, she goes into the village. Why the rush into Brighton?"

"I imagine," said Coralie carelessly, "that she's gone in to see Lawrence. We had a slight argument. I imagine Lolly has gone carrying tales to her old friend."

The contempt in her tone brought the color to Teresa's cheeks. Slow, unaccustomed anger rose in her, but she kept her voice steady. "What was the argument about?" she asked.

"Don't try to be naïve, my pet," begged Coralie. "I go away for little more than a week, and during that time Lolly allows you to make a fool of yourself with a man nobody has ever heard of. Did you think I would let it pass without even mentioning it?"

"Lolly had nothing whatever to do with it. When she saw Mark, it was too late to do anything."

"You mean that you fell deeply in love with him after one glance?"

"I think so," said Teresa steadily.

"You met him, I understand"—Coralie's voice now held open contempt—"in your Uncle Hubert's house?"

Teresa hesitated; Lolly had obviously been under cross-examination. "Yes."

"And this man is living there as a boarder—a lodger?"

"Yes. At least, he was. He's not living there any more."

Coralie leaned back. "He has a job?"

"Yes. He's—he's something in the City."

"What, exactly?"

"I don't know."

"He has an income? Prospects?"

"We didn't go into it."

"He saw you at your uncle's, knew who you were, knew from what he had heard previously in the house that you were certainly not poor. He set out to make an impression on you—and he succeeded."

"Yes, he succeeded."

"I rang up Neville early this morning," proceeded Coralie, "and I asked him to go to your uncle's house and make inquiries about this man. They must know something about him. When we know a little, we can find out more."

"And if you don't find out anything discreditable?" asked Teresa.

"His behavior all the way has been discreditable. Why do you think he was in so great a hurry to pursue you? Because I was away. Why was he so anxious to get away last night? Because he didn't want to be questioned too closely by me. Why isn't he here this morning, to present his case?"

"He will be," said Teresa.

"And so will Neville. He's coming down as soon as he has been to your uncle's house."

Teresa sat unmoving, her hands clasped tightly on her lap, her toast untouched, her coffee untasted. She had expected some initial opposition from her mother, but she had not been prepared for this cool, swift action. There had been little talk of feelings; her mother was unreservedly, inflexibly on the side of Neville. She would not feel drawn to Mark because her daughter loved him; she would not see him until she had sufficient evidence with which to confront and if possible convict him.

A picture of Neville rose in her mind. He had, she supposed, been in love with her—but she had at no time experienced in his company any of the warmth, the confidence, the trembling joy that had come when she had lain in Mark's arms. Neville had been affectionate, but nothing more. Now she seemed to hear her mother's advice to him: "Give her time; don't rush her." She saw her own early misgivings brushed aside, and knew that if there had been no Mark to appear at this late hour to save her, she would have married Neville and spent the rest of her life regretting it.

She brought Mark into her mind picture and set him beside Neville. Two men: one broad and powerful, the other slight, tall, in his way as strong. Neville, dark and serious; Mark, fair and incurably lighthearted. Light of heart? Deep and generous of heart. He would not come up to her mother's material requirements; he had spoken little of his background or his prospects—but she knew that she herself was content to take him as he was, and she knew with a deep certainty that she would be safe with him all her life.

Her mother's voice brought her back to herself. "Did you hear me, Teresa? Neville is here. His car is outside, and I gave orders that he was to be shown into the drawing room when he came. I'm going upstairs to dress; will you go and see him?"

Teresa went into the drawing room. Neville turned to face her as she entered; he spoke at once, and his voice was quiet.

"Your mother asked me to come down," he said. "I've one or two things to tell her—but I would have come in any case. I had to see you."

Teresa stood helplessly in the middle of the room. "I'm . . . sorry, Neville," she said. "I can't say any more than that. I know it's inadequate, but . . . I should never have become engaged to you." She slipped his ring off her finger and, as he made no move to take it, placed it gently on the table between them. "Please forgive me."

He stared miserably at the ring. Then he picked it up and put it into his pocket.

"Perhaps you'll put it on again one day," he said. "I've no doubt that you're pretty well infatuated with this fellow—but he isn't exactly all you think he is, you know."

"I know that my mother asked you to go to my uncle's house and make inquiries about him. I hope you didn't do anything of the kind."

"Why not? Why shouldn't I? A man comes out of the blue and you hand me back my ring. If I didn't want to know who and what he was, I'd be a fool. And if those who've got your interests at heart didn't check up on him, they'd be even greater fools. You fell in love, or thought you did, and after that inquiries seemed superfluous. And that's why it was left to others to make the inquiries for you—to stop you from going any further before you've got your eyes wide open."

"I'm not infatuated, Neville."

"My dear, you are—deeply and thoroughly. You're a decent, gentle, trusting girl, just the right material for these parasites to get a hold on. But I'll wait and say it to your mother."

"If it concerns Mark, you can say it to me."

The door opened to admit Coralie, but close behind her came Lolly and Sir Lawrence. Coralie had no choice but to step aside and admit them. The cold look on her face told her extreme reluctance to see them at this moment.

"Good morning, Coralie," began Sir Lawrence at once. "I came back to see if you and I could talk over certain things."

"Lolly brought you. I told Teresa," said Coralie, "that she had gone running to you—and I was right."

"Quite right," said Lolly. She had turned to face Coralie—but before turning, her eyes had sought Teresa's and her lips had formed one word: outside.

It was enough. With a murmured excuse, Teresa fled out onto the drive to where Mark's car stood, and into the arms of Mark.

He could feel her swiftly beating heart, and his arms closed more tightly around her; his lips were on her hair.

"Losing your nerve?" he asked gently at last.

She freed herself and looked up at him. "No—oh, no! But . . . I thought mother would be angry and then come round. Only she isn't angry. She's—she's just cold and—and she sent Neville to find out things about you."

"I know. I saw Zoe." He cupped his hands about her face and smiled down at her. "And now you'll hear the whole sinister story."

She laughed up at him, love in her eyes. "Have you concealed anything from me?"

"Yes; I told you. Nothing that could affect us—you and me. But there are certain facts that Neville has brought to light, and you'd better come inside and let him throw them in my face."

"We could go now—go away," she said. "Couldn't we, Mark? Nobody could stop us. We could go away and leave all the recriminations behind, and all the arguments and all the quarreling."

"We could." Mark bent and kissed her. "We could—but I'd rather get it all over now. Are you frightened?"

"If you're with me—no."

"Then we'll go in and the music will strike up. Come on."

Coralie gave Mark a brief contemptuous look as he entered. "Here is Mr. Tudor." She swung round to face Teresa. "You formed your opinion of this man without having any knowledge of what he's really like. Neville made some inquiries about him from your uncle, and ——"

"Not her uncle," corrected Mark quietly. "It was her aunt who gave him all the facts."

"And the facts are these," said Coralie. "The first fact—isn't it so, Mr. Tudor?—is that you were living at Grosvenor Drive in order to find out all you could about my brother's monetary affairs."

"Absolutely correct," said Mark quietly.

"You went, in fact, to spy on them all?"

"You put it very harshly."

"You found out that if you could prove certain suspicions you had concerning Mrs. Towers and the other people in the house, you could use the knowledge profitably?"

"Correct," said Mark.

"You found out what you went to find out—and then you told Mrs. Towers what you know. But—for reasons of your own, you didn't go to the police. That's correct, isn't it?"

"Quite correct," said Mark, and put out a hand to take one of Teresa's. "Is that all?"

"All? A spy, an informer, and probably a blackmailer." Coralie's voice broke on an unpleasant laugh. "Should there be any more?"

"I have to go out for a short while, Mr. Grundy . . . I'll leave you in charge."

"Yes." It was Neville speaking. "Just on thing more. I told you that he'd found ou what he went to find out, but I didn't tell yo what it was. I would have said it before if hadn't thought that it would give pain to Lad Thurloe. It concerns her brother," said Nevill

"Nothing that concerns my brother will giv me the slightest pain," said Coralie. "Is he ill?

"No." Neville hesitated. "He's—he's dea He's been dead some time."

There was silence in the room, broken b Coralie's voice. "But I don't understand. M brother can't be dead, or I should have bee told of his death. The lawyers would have ha to know. I would have had to know."

"There were reasons why his wife didn want anybody to know that he had died."

"But that was impossible." Coralie frowne "On his death, his income was to go to me an then to —— Oh!" She stopped abruptly. "O course—the money," she said in a slow, tens voice. "The money!"

She swung round on Mark. "You knew— and you said nothing to Teresa. You knev that he had died and that that woman wa living on money that should have been mine?

"Yes, I knew," said Mark.

There was a pause. Coralie drew a long noisy breath. "When did he die?" she de manded, her voice vibrant with rage.

Mark's eyes went slowly round the circle: t Coralie, her face white, her eyes burning wit fury; to Neville, pale and expectant; to S Lawrence and Lolly and Teresa. Then his gaz came back to rest on Coralie.

"He died," he told her slowly, "fifteen yea ago."

In the long, tense silence that hung over th room after Mark's revelation, Teresa foun that her courage had returned. The storm w about to break—but there was something to b said first. She stepped to Neville's side; th words she said to him came easily and quietly and carried absolute conviction.

"You told me I was infatuated," she said "but you were wrong. Try to believe this Neville: nothing that happens now or in th future will affect what I said to you this morn ing. Whatever comes of this feeling betwee Mark and myself, I know one thing: I shal never marry anybody but him."

Neville's eyes rested on hers. "I don't know how you can bring yourself to care for him, o to trust him—but I know I'm washed up. An that"—he managed a smile—"doesn't leav me much to stay for."

"Don't go!" Coralie spoke sharply. "Nev ille, I forbid you to go!"

"If Teresa ever wants me, she knows where to find me." He looked at Teresa. "Good-by— and good luck."

He was gone swiftly. Then Coralie had ru to the door and was calling:

"Neville! Neville—come back!"

His only answer was the screech of tires a he turned out of the gateway. She closed th door and gave Mark a long look of utte hatred. She said slowly, "You will pleas leave my house and not return to it."

"I must make at least one more visit," pointed out Mark. "To take Teresa away."

Coralie's mouth tightened until the soft re lips hardened into a straight and ugly line After one glance, Lolly stepped forward.

"There's no point in standing here and say ing things we'll all be sorry for later on," sh suggested. "I think, Teresa, you ought to sen Mark home, and then we can ——"

"Get him out," came from Coralie in a strangled voice.

"Yes. Mark"—Lolly turned to him—"you can see, can't you, that it would be better i you went away at once?"

"Get out," came from Coralie in the sam strangled voice.

"Not quite yet," said Mark. "You mad certain inquiries about me and you have pu forward a number of accusations; if you won't discuss Teresa's future, you must allow me, think, to ——"

Coralie had taken a step toward Teresa, an was looking at her with burning eyes. "You got him in. Get him out," she ordered. "If you don't, you'll be sorry. I'm warning you."

Teresa stood quite still. She had seen he mother irritated, petulant, angry; she ha become used to the quick changes from graciousness to querulousness; she had heard the soft tones become hard and even shrill. But the changes had been momentary; a word from herself or from Lolly had been sufficient to restore the smoothness to Coralie's brow, the sweetness to her demeanor. This woman with a drawn mouth and gleaming eyes was a stranger to her, and after the first moment of horror, Teresa's heart filled with compunction and pity.

"Don't worry, mother," she said in a low, hurried voice, "Mark will go. He'll go now." She turned to him. "Won't you, Mark?"

"No," said Mark gently.

"But"—Sir Lawrence spoke incredulously—"but my dear fellow, can't you see that you're upsetting Lady Thurloe? This is no time to demand explanations or to ——"

"I'm demanding nothing," said Mark in the same quiet voice. "Teresa has done me the honor of saying that she loves me and will marry me. I'm not presuming to ask liking or affection from Lady Thurloe; all I'm saying is that before leaving the house I should be allowed to clear my name and present my credentials. I shall then go away and return, if Lady Thurloe wishes, only once more: to claim Teresa."

"You sneaked in," Coralie told Mark, "behind my back. I was away, and you knew you had to act quickly. Nothing about you or your circumstances is of any interest to anybody here. You will never marry Teresa if I have anything to do with it—and I shall have a great deal to do with it. I refuse to listen to anything you want to say. Now get out."

Her last words were shouted, and Teresa's face slowly became chalk-white. She looked at Mark appealingly. "You can't do any good by staying," she said. "Please go."

"I'll go," said Mark, "when I've said this: I love you and I mean to marry you. Nothing your mother can say or do will alter this fact. You are of age and you are free—and you lo me." His voice softened. "You do love m Teresa?"

"Yes. Yes, Mark, but ——"

"Then nothing can harm either of us." H turned to Lady Thurloe. "Please understar that. Teresa's engagement was a mistak and ——"

"Damn you!" said Coralie in a low voic "Oh, damn you."

"—— and she is now in love with me. W shall marry as soon as ——"

"I'll see you dead first," said Coralie.

Teresa gave a little sound of misery, b nobody heard it; the room might have be empty save for the two who now faced ea other by the window: Coralie, tense with ra and hatred and looking like an animal abo to spring; and Mark, tall, calm, his gray ey held unmovingly on the distraught wom before him.

"Teresa is going to marry me—but that not why you are angry," he told her in a slo deliberate tone. "You are angry because ——

"You knew he'd been dead all those yea didn't you?" she broke in fiercely. "And y knew that that woman was living on mon that should have been mine? And you didn go to the police?"

"No."

"Why didn't you? Because you saw son thing for yourself in it?"

"I saw something for your brother's wid in it. She needed the money."

"She was a thief—and you knew it. F fifteen years she had been defrauding me—a you didn't expose her."

"I felt that she was using the money to b ter purpose than you would have done."

"Four hundred pounds a year—for fifte years. Did you work that sum out?"

"Yes, I did. The total came to six thousa pounds."

"And you knew that it should have cor to me?"

"Yes, I knew," said Mark. "But when I w certain that Mr. Towers had died—he di abroad, of a heart attack—I had to deci whether I should expose a woman who w using the money to good purpose, and ma her give it up to a woman who would use simply to add to the comfort she already e joyed. I thought you had enough—and I kn she hadn't. It was a very easy choice."

"You wouldn't by any chance have thoug of blackmailing her?"

Mark smiled; a brief, cold smile. "No knew that money meant a great deal to you knew that your quarrel with your brother h been caused by the fact that he wanted so of your money—and you refused to let h have it. You would have enjoyed taking t income from your brother's wife. If I h imagined that you would be generous, that y would have shared the income with her, t you would have given her all or part of it her needs—I would have told you the tru before I ever met Teresa. But I knew m about you than you realize, and I decided leave the income where it was—being used good purpose. What would you have do with it?"

For answer, Coralie raised a hand and l it viciously across his cheek. There was moment's dead silence, broken by a gasp horror from Teresa.

She had never in her life seen anybo struck. Nobody had ever raised a hand her; her childish chastisements had been the form of tasks or penalties suited to t wrongdoing. She had seen violence on the sta and on the screen; she had read of cruelty of brutality. But in her small, sheltered wo there had been no voice raised in shrill abu no hand lifted to inflict injury. Nobody in h experience had ever deliberately injured a other person.

Now before her was the spectacle of h mother: this morning an elegant wom seated before a breakfast table, quiet, finitely gracious; now a harridan, har curled like claws, a face twisted to incredil ugliness, eyes almost blind with fury.

She waited for Mark to turn and leave—b Mark stood unmoving.

unheeded, began to run down Teresa's cheeks. "I love Teresa and I am going to marry her. You cannot stop me and you cannot stop her. And you cannot hurt either of us any more."

For a moment Coralie's head went from side to side like someone seeking escape—then she had made a rush to a table and seized a heavy vase. For one appalled second it seemed that she would hurl it at Mark—but she dashed it, instead, to the wall and it shattered into a dozen pieces. Before they had fallen to the ground, she had thrown a delicate china plate and two delicate statuettes.

"Mother!" Teresa started forward, but Lolly's strong arm barred her way.

"Leave this to me," she said firmly. "I told him that this would happen." She was beside Coralie, and had taken her arm. "Come with me," she said gently. "Come and lie down. Come along and I'll settle you down with a good hot cup of something, and then you can sleep for a bit. Come along."

There was a moment's uncertainty—and then Coralie had turned and was accompanying her. When the door closed behind the two women, Teresa walked tremblingly to a window and stood with her back to it, staring across the room at Mark, her eyes wide and incredulous.

Mark took a step forward and then stopped. "Teresa ——"

"You—you knew," she said slowly. "You knew that mother would—would ——"

"Yes, I knew."

"You—you baited her. You said what you did to—to make her—to make her lose control and —— That's true, isn't it?"

"That's true," acknowledged Mark.

The government is us; we are the government, you and I.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

"You knew, and you didn't care how she looked, or how she behaved, because you—because you wanted me to see her . . . like that."

Mark's mouth suddenly twisted in pain. "Yes," he said.

"You say you love me—and yet you could make my mother . . . you could expose her ——" Her voice became strangled and died away. "Please go away," she said in a low voice.

"Will you listen to me, Teresa?"

"No. What you did just now—it was horrible. And you did it deliberately, and ——" There was a pause, and when she spoke again her voice was inflexible. "Please go away," she said. "I never want to see you again. Never. Never."

She did not know how long she stood there. She heard no sound. But when at last she turned, she saw that Mark had gone.

Teresa did not see her mother until the following day. Then, passing her room before lunch, she saw the door open, and paused before it. Coralie lay in bed, behind her shoulders a pile of snowy pillows. She wore a loose jacket of palest blue; her eyes, of a deeper shade of blue, looked out at Teresa calmly, even placidly. Of yesterday's storm there was not the smallest sign, unless it showed in the slightly heightened color in her cheeks. She had never looked more lovely, more composed, more self-possessed.

Lolly, tray in hand, edged Teresa aside. "Let your mother have her lunch in peace," she urged. "Then you can come up and see her and talk as much as you please." She laid the tray before Coralie. "Chicken and mushroom," she told her, "and the teeniest bottle of white wine to make you feel good. Teresa"—she spoke over her shoulder—"I'll join you downstairs."

When she came down, Teresa was standing by the sideboard looking listlessly at the food placed upon it. She looked up as Lolly entered, but for a time neither spoke. Yesterday they had said little to each other; Lolly had spent most of the day waiting on Coralie.

"Well"—Lolly pulled out a chair and sat heavily upon it—"it's over. It's over and done with. And if I were you, I wouldn't let it worry me." She put up a hand and pushed back her hair. "You know what, Teresa? I'm a fool and that old livery Lawrence is a fool. We wanted you to grow up thinking your mother was an angel—and that was wrong."

"No—you weren't wrong," said Teresa.

"Yes—we were," said Lolly. "I feel at this moment like a woman who's been holding her ears waiting for an explosion to go off, only to find that there's no explosion and, what's more, no bomb. Any time during the past five years or more, you could have found out that your mother had hell's own temper—and it wouldn't have hurt you. But we were so busy protecting you that we didn't see you were grown up and not a baby any more. And now you can go ahead and talk."

"Do we have to? I mean, do we have to talk about—about that?" asked Teresa.

"Yes, we do. Mark understood that. And Mark was right."

"Mark was wrong. Please, Lolly, don't let's talk about it."

"If you don't want to, I won't. But why not give it all a good airing? What do you think it feels like for me to know that something your father wanted to protect you from has happened—is over, done with, finished with, and could have been over and done with years ago?"

"My father tried to —— I don't understand," Teresa said.

"Then sit down and I'll tell you."

Teresa sat down. Lolly pushed her plate aside, put her elbows on the table.

"When you first spoke of going to see your Uncle Hubert," she said, "I was frightened. If your mother found out, I knew it would make trouble. I was afraid she might make a scene—the kind of scene she made yesterday, the kind of scene she made when your uncle came and told her he'd married Zoe. It was your father's first view of the other side of your mother—and it had an effect on him that never wore off. And he was afraid it would affect you in the same way. I promised him I'd come and live here and do what I could to keep your mother contented enough to prevent her from doing—well, what she did yesterday."

"You mean that all these years you've been giving in to mother because you thought ——"

"It wasn't a matter of giving in. You get to know how to handle certain people, after a time."

"When did you tell Mark that mother might ——"

"—— make a scene? I didn't. I hinted—and then I got Lawrence to talk to him."

"He worked mother up, deliberately and callously."

"He wanted a showdown—and he got it." Lolly looked at Teresa's white, strained face. "You're worrying," she said gently.

"If you think I'm worrying about Mark, you're wrong."

"Then you're worrying because you want to know what your mother means to do about Zoe."

"Yes."

"Why don't you go upstairs and find out?"

Teresa looked at her, and pushed away her plate. "I will," she said. "I'll go now."

Teresa, tapping gently on her mother's door, went in to find the tray still on her bed. Coralie had, Teresa noted, eaten and drunk everything. She put the tray on a table and sat on the edge of the bed, and Coralie studied her briefly. "How much did you know about what was going on at your uncle's house?" Coralie asked.

"Nothing whatsoever."

"You accepted, I suppose, the explanation you were given—that your uncle was abroad?"

"Yes."

"Fifteen years ——" Coralie spoke musingly. "She must have been laughing at me—for fifteen years. But I don't think"—her voice did not lose its gentleness—"I don't think she'll laugh much longer."

"I"—Teresa hesitated—"I did like her, mother."

Coralie gave a slight smile. "Darling, you liked her because you had no means of knowing what sort of woman she really was. Lying here, yesterday and this morning, I've been thinking about you. It isn't really wise to provide too much shelter for one's children. They should be taught what the world is really like, what people are really like."

"Yes, they should," agreed Teresa.

"Going to that house at all was a hideous mistake. You weren't equipped to judge them; you were taken in—and now, I hope, you'll see how near you were to wrecking your life."

Teresa sat quietly, and appeared to listen—but her mind was only partly on her mother's words. She was struggling to set her world straight once more, and she was aware that she could not arrange it exactly as it had been before her mother's outburst. Nothing, she realized, had changed—except her own focus. The picture had sharpened, and the defects were visible—but they had been there always, and if she had allowed herself to get a closer view, she would have seen them before. Lolly and her godfather had decided that she should get only the distant, softened view—but all their protection would have been in vain if she had not lent herself to the deception. She had joined in the conspiracy; she had exercised all Lolly's care, and more, to keep her mother's most charming side uppermost. She had preferred to keep the scene in all its lovely completeness: Folly Cottage in all its trim beauty, her mother in all her smoothness and elegance—and their lives a succession of pleasant, ordered days. It had been a façade—and she had been aware of it in the deep, deep recesses of her mind—and she had chosen to leave things as Lolly and Lawrence had arranged them.

But Mark. . . . Mark had been resolved to sweep away pretenses. He wanted her to see her mother as she was—and he had shown her.

He had shown her. He had been right—but he had been cruel. He had glimpsed, before it was too late, the ugliness of what he was about to reveal—and he had torn aside the last shreds of pretense and left her mother naked under the white light of truth.

Coralie reached for the little book in which she kept telephone numbers. "I'm going to ring up Walter Creed. I'm sorry I shan't be able to see his expression when he finds out that for fifteen years he's been paying my income to somebody who wasn't entitled to it. I shall prosecute, of course," went on Coralie.

"Prosecute?"

"Naturally. Fifteen years—four hundred a year. I don't know what Walter will call it. Misrepresentation? She must have been signing my brother's name for all those years. False pretenses."

"Mother"—Teresa spoke gently, but urgently—"couldn't you just . . . let it go?"

"Let it go? You mean not sue her?"

"Couldn't you perhaps see her or ask Walter Creed ——"

"Teresa, would you leave this to me, please? Do you think for one moment that I shall behave as though six thousand pounds meant nothing at all to me? After my brother's death, it was mine—and she stole it."

Teresa waited, but there was nothing more; no word of regret for Hubert's death, no curiosity regarding his end. Coralie had been wronged, and was in pursuit of those who had wronged her.

She rose and picked up the tray. "I'll take this downstairs," she said.

After much searching, Teresa found Lolly seated in the small summerhouse at the end of the garden, staring out with a blank and uninterested gaze at the little fish swimming in the pond nearby. She had been crying; her square, ugly face was mottled and her eyes red-rimmed. As Teresa came up to her, she made a clumsy attempt to get rid of the traces of tears.

"Lolly"—Teresa sat on the wooden bench beside her and took her hand—"Lolly, I've never seen you cry."

"Cry—crying's no use," said Lolly heavily. "Except to make me uglier than I am."

"Was it very difficult, all these years—keeping mother happy?"

"No. It became a sort of habit. If an argument developed, I had to let the thing slide and bring it up in a different way, that's all."

"I've been doing it, too, in my own way, haven't I?" said Teresa gently.

Lolly turned to look at her. "I suppose . . . yes," she said slowly. "We think children are fools, but they're not. Certainly not you. What we really feared was that you would feel the horror your father did at finding out how ugly your mother could be when she was thwarted."

"She's going to tell Walter Creed to—to ——"

"Institute proceedings?"

"Yes. Lolly, I've got to do something."

"What can you do?"

Teresa rose and stood looking down at the older woman. "I'm going to see Zoe."

"Now? This minute?"

"Why not?"

"If your mother wants to know where you are?"

"At this moment," said Teresa, "mother isn't really interested in me, or in my future—or even in Mark. All her mind is on ——"

"—— getting her own back on Zoe. Well, give Zoe my love, and tell her she'd better gird her loins, or whatever. And Teresa ——" She paused. Her tongue trembled with the urge to put questions about Mark—and then, with a mighty effort, she fought back the words.

"What were you going to say?"

"Nothing. Nothing at all," said Lolly stoutly.

Zoe answered the door at Teresa's summons, and ushered the girl inside. Teresa, entering, was at once aware of a change in the house. All was quiet; there were no trembling airs on the violin, no furious clacking of castanets, no whir of a sewing machine—and no anxious heads peering from the landing.

"The baron and his wife—they are out," said Zoe. "Maxie is in the kitchen, and Paloma is in her room. She is—she is unhappy. Please—will you go in." She paused and looked at Teresa. "You . . . know everything?"

"I know something. I came to find out the rest. I—I was worried about you."

"Each year, each half of a year when I received your uncle's money, I prayed that God would forgive me. Because I did not"—her dark eyes rested on Teresa—"I did not do it from greed."

She indicated a chair, but Teresa remained standing. "Zoe"—her voice was urgent—"my mother knows, and—and she's angry."

"She will send me to prison if she can—yes?"

"I'm afraid so."

Zoe shrugged. "It had to be so; soon—or now," she said. "I did not hope that I could go on for so long. Fifteen years." She fell into a reverie and then roused herself. "Please sit down. I would like to tell you everything."

They sat on stiff, high-backed chairs, face to face, intent, absorbed.

"He died in France," began Zoe quietly. "It was true what I told you—that he traveled all the time. He found this house, I think, very dull; and because he could not afford to pay for so much traveling, he began to make certain . . . arrangements."

She paused and went on with her story.

"The arrangements were not honest; he received money—and other things—from people, but he did not pay them back. He arranged with the baron that he would live in their house and that he would in his turn entertain them in England. House? No, theirs was not a house; it was a palace, a château. I know, for I worked there when I was a girl. It was through my descriptions that he knew so much of the baron and the baronne and of their home. He made himself known to them—not as my husband, mon Dieu, no! As a rich traveler only. He lived with them; he could be charming, like your mother, and they liked him. And then—war came. And the baron, living in France, was not French—but German. He thought that if he could get to England, he could perhaps use this house, as your uncle had promised him. But . . . he had no papers. And your uncle, who wished to stay at the château, who did not wish to come back here—your uncle got papers for him. They were forged—for the baron, for the baronne, and also for Maxie, who had for many years been their servant, and Paloma. It was dangerous—but they came, and they found that the house was not grand, and that I, their old servant, was mistress here. And the money that your uncle owed them—how could I pay them? But they had nowhere else to go. I had to keep them—feed them."

She paused, and Teresa put a question. "My uncle?"

"When the Germans came near, he tried to leave France—but he was too late. He hid for some time—and he died in hiding. The news was sent, by this one and by that one, to Maxie."

"And—and the authorities didn't ——"

"Nobody knew—only those who had hidden him, and those who had passed the news of how he had died. But I knew that if I told the lawyers—Creed and Creed—I would have no more of the money. I was keeping all four of them here—and I had not a penny. The old people had given much—and had got nothing in return. Maxie—he could not earn much. Paloma was a child. And so ——"

A long sigh came from her—a sigh almost, Teresa thought, of relief.

"It is over," she said slowly. "And I think that I am glad. For years we felt safe, we were almost happy. But then . . . people began to come. Walter Creed came. His brother came. Mark guessed what we were hiding. But Mark did not make accusations, as the other man did—your fiancé. When he had gone, Mark came to see me again and I told him what had happened."

"Mark would never have told the police."

"No. But your fiancé would tell your mother, and your mother ——" She stopped. "That is why you have come—is it not so? Your mother—I think that she will try to send me to prison."

"Zoe"—Teresa broke in impulsively—"I'm going to see the lawyers. I can tell them what you've told me just now and they can ——"

"What can they do?" asked Zoe gently. "Nothing. But you are kind, Teresa. The lawyers will perhaps wish to be kind—but they will have to do as your mother wishes."

"Walter will talk to her. When I've been to see him," said Teresa, "he'll talk to mother and he'll make her act reasonably. You didn't use the money for yourself—you used it to help people to whom my uncle owed something." Teresa rose and stood looking down at the older woman. "We're not going to sit down and let mother have things all her own way, Zoe."

Zoe put out a hand and touched Teresa's. "You are very good, and I am glad that you came—and that we liked each other. But I

How to make a good cup of Coffee!

Drip Maker

Rinse with very hot water. Never use less than ¾ capacity of drip pot. For each cup of coffee, bring to boil 6 fluid oz. fresh cold water (¾ measuring cup) in kettle or other pot. Put 1 Standard Measure (2 level tablespoons) of "drip" grind coffee, per cup, into filter section. Slowly pour vigorously boiling water into upper section. After dripping, remove upper section and stir. To keep hot: place over very low heat or on an asbestos pad over lowered flame. Do not boil. Serve as soon as possible. Because coffee is at its best only when fresh, do not re-heat it.

Vacuum Maker

Rinse with very hot water. For each cup of coffee, bring to boil in lower bowl 6 fluid oz. fresh cold water (¾ measuring cup). Never use less than ¾ capacity of maker. Use 1 Standard Measure (2 level tablespoons) of "drip" or "fine" grind coffee, per cup. Remove boiling water from heat. Fit upper bowl with filter over lower — twist tight. Place on reduced heat. When most of the water has risen into upper bowl, stir. In 1 to 3 minutes, depending on grind used and strength desired, remove from heat. Serve at once. (Rinse filter thoroughly and store in cold water.)

Percolator

Rinse with very hot water. Never use less than ¾ capacity of maker. For each cup of coffee, bring to boil in percolator 6 fluid oz. fresh cold water (¾ measuring cup). Put 1 Standard Measure (2 level tablespoons) of "regular" grind coffee, per cup, into basket. When water boils, lower heat, put basket into percolator, cover. Percolate very slowly for 6 to 8 minutes. To keep hot, place over very low heat or on an asbestos pad over the lowered flame — do not boil. Serve as soon as possible. And because coffee is at its delicious best only when fresh, do not re-heat it.

am not afraid. I know what I did, and I know hat there are penalties for doing it—and I am eady. I ask only that the old people should be ooked after—and Maxie, and Paloma."

Teresa bent over her and kissed her gently on her wet cheek. "I'll come back, Zoe," she aid. "Please, please don't worry."

Zoe did not move; as Teresa closed the door of the room behind her, she knew that the older woman was praying.

She went through the hall, into the little outer hall, opened the door—and then stood rooted to the spot, fear flooding her heart.

On the steps stood a policeman—and Teresa had seen him before. He had tried to detain Paloma in the street—and Paloma had broken away from him and had run to the house.

There was silence for some moments; Teresa struggled to get her fears under control, and then spoke coolly. "Are you looking for anybody?"

"I am." The strong young face came closer as the man came on to the topmost step. "I'm looking for ——"

A fear, black and shaking, welled up in Teresa. She broke into the man's sentence with a trembling question. "Who—who sent you here?" she asked.

"Mr. Mark Tudor sent me," he replied.

"He—he told you to come here?" she heard herself asking.

"He did. And now if you'll ——"

But Teresa heard no more. With a swift movement, she had pulled the front door shut behind her and had slid past the man barring her way. She was running, heedless of his shout behind her; she was running toward the taxi rank at the corner of the street. She had reached it and was fumbling at the door of the foremost taxi. She was in and was giving a breathless direction.

"Pym's Court."

"City?"

"Yes. Hurry, please."

Walter would know what to do. He and Lawrence would see that nothing was done to hurt Zoe. She, Teresa, had money; she would give it to make up the loss her mother had incurred throughout the years. Zoe ——

Mark. Had Mark betrayed them? Mark, of the clear gray eyes and the light manner that concealed—concealed what? The police at the house—sent by Mark.

A sob shook her, and she strained forward as though she could speed the taxi on its way. Kingsway . . . Aldgate . . . Fleet Street; they were coming nearer. They were turning down the narrow alley; they had come to a halt before the door with the series of small brass plates. She was paying the taxi; she had turned and was running swiftly up the dark, narrow stairs leading to Walter Creed's office.

She saw the mild surprise on the old clerk's face as she came to a panting halt at his desk.

"Mr. Walter Creed?"

"Yes, Miss Thurloe. He's expecting you."

Teresa followed him down the familiar passage. They skirted a workman who was busy painting a door, and edged their way past his pails and brushes. Then they were before the door on which was displayed Walter's name. The next moment Teresa was in the room and the tall, white-haired man was rising from his chair and coming round the desk to greet her.

"Teresa, my dear!" He took in her flushed, breathless air. "Did you run all the way from Brighton?"

"No. I just —— Oh, Walter," she burst out, "you've got to help me."

"That is what we are here for. You want us to help your Uncle Hubert's widow?"

Teresa gave a gasp of relief. "Oh—has Lolly told you?"

"She told us a part." He leaned forward. "Why did you come here looking so panic-stricken?"

"My mother is going to prosecute, and ——"

"She rang me up. What else?"

"I went to see my uncle's widow at Grosvenor Drive. The—the police are there."

"The police!"

"Yes. And I came here at once and —— Oh, Walter, I know the money wasn't hers to use—Zoe, I mean—and I know she had every right to it—mother, I mean—but there was a good reason why she had to have it—I'm talking about Zoe. She's good, Walter, she's good and you've got to believe me when I tell you that ——"

"Please!"

Teresa came to a breathless halt and gazed miserably at the man before her. Walter Creed waited for a moment and then spoke slowly and clearly. "You will have to add your knowledge to ours," he told her, "and then we shall be able to form a clear picture. We have a file on the subject, and you had better see it. Will you come with me?"

Teresa began to speak, thought better of it, and rose. She knew Walter and she knew Hilary; they went at their own pace, and it was a slow, steady tramp. She could not rush them; she could not even hurry them.

He opened the door for her and she stepped into the corridor. Walter led her past two doors and stopped at the third, and Teresa saw that it was the one on which the painter had been at work. He was collecting his pails and brushes, his task done; she saw on the glass panel the newly painted letters of a name. Then Walter opened the door.

But she did not go in. She did not see through the open door the desk, the filing cabinets, the swivel chair and, rising from it, a young model of the City lawyer, black of coat and striped of trousers. Her eyes were on the letters and she was staring at the name that they spelled. Motionless, speechless, she gazed at it. Walter, beside her, smiled gently.

"Our new junior partner," he purred, "will put you in touch with all that we know of the affairs of your uncle's wife. Teresa, I think you know our Mr. Tudor?"

Without waiting for an answer, he went out and closed the door behind him.

Of that moment, all Teresa could remember later was the smell of paint in her nostrils. The rest was a haze: she was in Mark's arms; she was safe. In the long silence she stood quite still and felt his lips on her hair and his heart beating close to hers.

"You were angry with me," Mark said.

"Not for long."

"I had to hurt you."

"I know. And you were right. But Lolly was right too—before that."

"Yes. How is your mother?"

"Exactly as usual." She freed herself and looked at him. "Mark, Zoe ——"

"I know. Your mother's after her blood. Well, that's what we all expected. Why are you staring at me?"

"I haven't seen you dressed like this before."

He looked down at his immaculate attire. "I should have prepared you. But Walter would have his little joke."

"He knew . . . about us?"

"From the first moment. I rang him up that first day and told him you'd come to your uncle's house. He agreed with me when I said that it was a miracle—and he wished me luck."

"Mark—begin at the beginning."

"It's a long story." he said. "I'll take you home with me and you can ask all the questions you like on the way."

But Teresa asked no questions as they drove; she was content to sit beside him and watch his long, lean hands on the wheel and remember the first time she had seen him outside her uncle's house.

He turned into a quiet street and brought the car to a standstill before a large mansion. "Well, there it is," he said. "I suppose you think this is a more suitable background for me than the house in Grosvenor Drive?"

"It's slightly smarter, isn't it?"

"David and I enjoyed being at Zoe's; we were both sorry to leave."

"Walter sent you there, to—to find out things, didn't he?"

"He did. And so Neville was right; I was doing a nasty, low-down spying job. But it had to be done. We had to find out what had become of your uncle—because we were pretty certain something had happened to him. At one time he was always dropping in to see Walter or Hilary; not in a friendly way—merely to say harsh things about your mother. Then he stopped coming and they began to wonder. Walter went alooking and ——"

"And didn't get in."

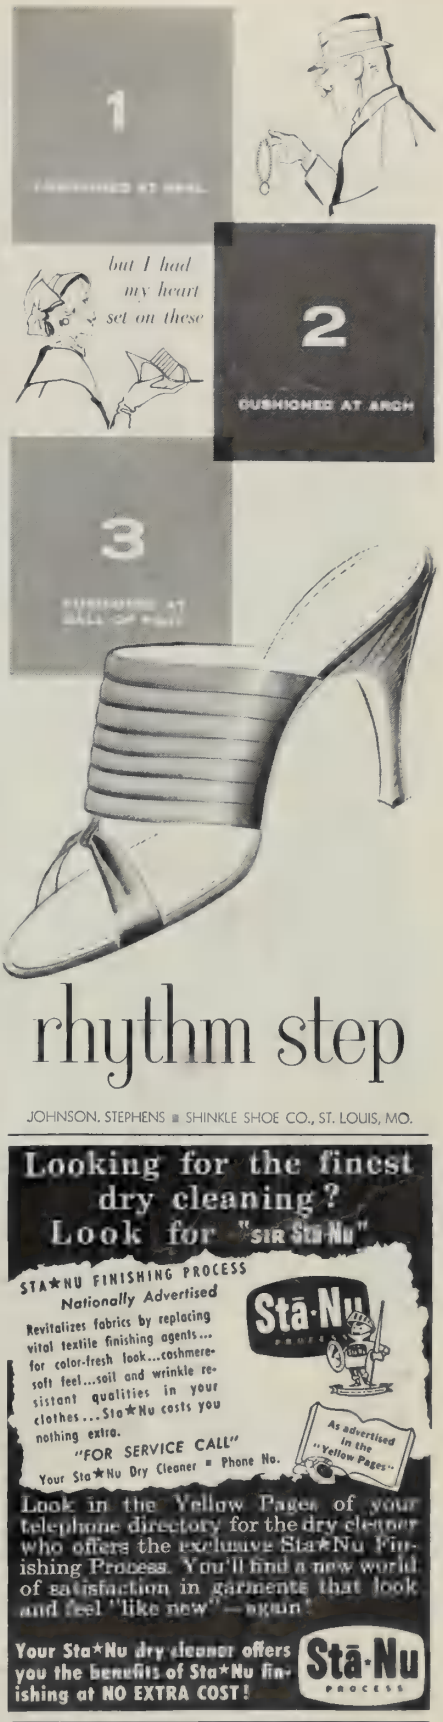
"Quite. And neither did Hilary. Zoe recognized the name. And so they thought it might be a good idea if I had a go—not as a member of the firm, but as a stranger looking for rooms. On the purest impulse I took David along. When she opened the door and saw us both standing there ——" He frowned. "It was almost too easy. She took us both in."

"And how soon did you ——"

He laughed. "You were in the house—you saw them all," he said. "It didn't take a Sherlock Holmes to know that they were all as frightened as blazes every time strangers came to the door. But the real question was: where was Hubert? No letters came from him—Zoe used to read out bits from letters on days when I knew that the postman had passed the house without delivering anything. And the letter she read from was always the same one. I thought, once or twice, that Zoe would tell me the truth. She trusted me—but she always stopped just on the brink of bringing it all out."

"Did you tell Zoe who you were? In the end, I mean?"

"Yes. I told her when I knew that your mother would make some inquiries about me. She would send somebody to the house, and I wanted to prepare Zoe. And I wanted to tell her what to say. Neville went to see her—and then went back to your mother with what he thought was the full story."



"But ——"

"He told your mother—and from that moment her mind swerved off your affairs and became centered on her own. The big blow-up was not caused by the fact that you were going to marry me; it arose from her sudden realization that for fifteen years she'd been missing out on a pay check." He kissed Teresa gently. "She's selfish—so what?" he went on. "She's apt to go off the handle if she finds herself in a corner without something she wants—who cares? You and I will love her when she'll let us, and duck when she starts throwing things—and either way, it won't matter much to either of us."

SONNET FOR THE GOOD WARRIOR

By RALPH L. KINSEY

Let no proud ritual or trumpet's blare
Disturb the quiet laurel on your brow:
Who lies companioned by a holy vow
Lies equal with the immortal and the fair.
Alike, as Bruce, with heather in his hair,
Lonely and hunted through the lowland slough,
Or Jason, putting the bronze-legged bulls to plow,
You mock the legioned makers of despair.
Sleep dreamless from the hills of holocaust,
While golden suns burn astral-white with age
And weary populations drift to dust.
Some gleaner in the field of final rage,
Sifting with idle hands the crumpled stone,
Will marvel at the beauty of your bone.

"Lolly did it because ——"

"I know. But you'd been wrapped up long enough. My guess was that you didn't really imagine your mother was the twenty-two-carat charmer you all made her out to be. But you didn't want a scene because it was easier, it was more comfortable, it was more in keeping with those pleasant surroundings to avoid jarring notes. In other words, you didn't want your sugar house to fall down. Am I right?"

"Yes. Were you always so bright," asked Teresa, "or was it a late flowering?"

"You think I'm too clever?"

"I think you're wonderful."

"Good. And don't worry about Zoe. And speaking of Zoe, when you saw that policeman, why did you bolt straight to Walter?"

"The policeman said you'd sent him. I thought —— No," she corrected herself, "no, I didn't really think you'd done anything like that." She rested her cheek against his. "I'd seen him before. He—he was after Paloma."

"That must be what they call woman's intuition. Because that's just what he was—after Paloma. He's been hanging round her, desperate with love and longing, for nearly four months. I don't suppose he's noticed one single criminal activity on his beat during all that time—he's just been in a daze, dreaming of Paloma and wondering how he could get past her papa. And so when I happened to drive past him this morning, I stopped the car and leaned out and said to him, 'Brother, the door's open; go in and get her.'"

"Little friend of all the world," said Teresa gently.

Lolly waited impatiently as Lawrence's birthday present was wrapped and tied; then she hurried awkwardly out of the shop and walked to the bus stop. Once on the bus, she relaxed for the first time since leaving the cottage. Her mind went back to Teresa's announcement that she was going up to stay in London and shop—and to see Mark—for a couple of days. She, Lolly, had waited for Coralie to fall down dead with shock—and what had Coralie done? Coralie had looked up from the morning paper and said, "Oh, really, dear?" and gone on reading. No arguments, no recriminations—one might have added, no interest.

A judge remarked last week that a wise husband never forgets his wife's birthday. He merely forgets which one it is.

The house was the same, reflected Lolly—and not the same. Something had stretched, something had snapped—and no great damage had been done. And things would go on exactly as before. Coralie would be charming and she, Lolly, would try to keep her so. Teresa would marry and go away, and whether she would come home from time to time to stay at the cottage all depended upon Coralie.

She fell into a dream; it was all very confusing, but on the whole it was all very pleasant. Teresa—and Mark. And their children. They would live in London and—with luck—come down to the cottage for weekends and holidays, and drive to the sea, and she would teach the children the breast stroke and show them how to float. Leave the cottage? No, she would never leave the cottage. Coralie would never ask her to stay, and would show no sign of wanting her to stay—but Coralie needed her, and knew it. There would be no more affection between them than there had been in the past—but there would be no more strife either.

A glimpse of unfamiliar roads made her realize that she had passed her bus stop. She got off the bus and walked back toward Sir Lawrence's house. As she reached it, she saw Mark's car turn into the road, and stood waiting for it to draw up. Teresa and Mark got out and she greeted them affectionately.

Sir Lawrence came as usual to the door to let them in, but he led them not to the little study, but to the drawing room. Lolly stood on the threshold looking round and clicking her tongue.

"How did you get the old she-bear to let you in here?" she asked. "Aren't you frightened of her any more?"

"I am not."

"Then perhaps you'll grow into a ma after all. Would there be any nice healt tomato juice among those poisons on t table?"

Lawrence laughed and brought her a glas "Here," he said. "How was Coralie when yo left her?"

"Plotting vengeance," Lolly told him. H face became anxious and she looked Mark. "What's going to happen to Zoe?" sh asked.

"Nothing," said Mark. "Nothing u pleasant. Sir Lawrence has seen to that."

"What did you do?" Lolly asked the ol man.

"We've arranged," Sir Lawrence told he "to let Coralie have the six thousand pound Teresa will pay the money out of the inher tance she got from her father. If Corali doesn't spend it, it will come back to Teres eventually. Walter will tell Coralie that Zo has managed to raise the money—and she wi never be told how."

"She won't care how," said Lolly. "Bu she'll still sue."

"She won't," said Mark. "Suing means go ing into court and giving evidence—and lis tening to evidence presented by the other side There are certain aspects of the case whic Teresa's mother wouldn't care to have widel known."

"Such as?"

Sir Lawrence smiled grimly. "Such as th fact that Hubert spent years on the Continer cheating people. Pure swindling. The pictur of Zoe trying to make reparation for her hus band's misdeeds isn't quite the one Corali wants to paint for the jury. No"—he raised his glass t Teresa and Mark—"Goo bless you both. Coralie won't prosecute. Revenge is sweet, but six thousand pounds is sweeter, and she'll settle for it. When are you two going to be married?"

"Four weeks and two days from now," said Mark "I'm going to drive Lolly and Teresa home after lunch and see what Lady Thurloe has to say about it. Somehow I feel she'll be at the wedding."

A gong, booming softly through the house brought Lolly's amazed eyes to rest on her host.

"In the name of Moses," she said slowly, "how did you get that old crow to ——"

"Lunch." Sir Lawrence offered her his arm. "My birthday lunch and"—he led them to the dining room—"my new and most valued housekeeper."

The neat, smiling woman standing by the sideboard turned for a moment, and Lolly after a single glance, had given a cry of amazement.

"Zoe!"

Zoe smiled. "Please—sit. The food should not get cold."

But Lolly did not sit. She was wringing Zoe's hand and congratulating Sir Lawrence and asking questions all at the same time.

"Did Sir Lawrence import the whole household?" she asked.

Zoe smiled and shook her head. "The others? No. I am here; I am cook; I am housekeeper."

"And the others?"

Zoe placed a bottle of wine by Sir Lawrence's plate; she looked serious, absorbed, entirely professional. "Please sit," she said once more. "Sir Lawrence will tell you of the others."

She went out to bring in the food, and Teresa answered Lolly's question.

"Maxie," she said, "stayed at Grosvenor Drive to look after the old people. Lawrence is going to buy the house from me—because it's mine and not mother's—and is going to let them live there."

"And Paloma," said Mark, "is going to marry her policeman. And Teresa and I are going to make Lolly our first godmother. And"—he turned to drop a light kiss on Teresa's cheek—"we are all going to live happily ever after."

"Amen," said Lolly. END

DIARY OF DOMESTICITY

The wrapping of gifts, I think thankfully, is ver. I have absolutely no manual dexterity, nd the struggle with ribbons that break and y papers that always crack along the edges the package has worn me out. I could never ze it without cellulose tape, which repairs eaks.

We always think of Christmas as a time of ow and pine trees and icicles and the tree corated with shiny balls and tinsel. But I d a friend who was newly married and went live in the tropics. She told me recently that e felt sorry for herself at first. The tropics re not for Christmas, and her family had ways done everything traditional for Christas in the North. Her husband came of a mily that did not make anything of Christas. So he paid no attention to the fact that was not snowing. She wept and was a homek young woman. And then it came to her at Christmas was not weather nor a place, t a state of mind. After all, Christ was not rn in the North; He was born in a subpical climate. And why not use a small lm tree as a Christmas tree? She could pin wers on the flat leaves. She could make her vn Christmas, because it was in her heart. This, I think, is true about Christmas. It y be in the country with snow clean and ld outside, or in the city, in a small apartnt, or in a hot climate with flowers bloomg and nights steaming. No matter, it is still ristmas. Whether you serve forth the plump spy turkey or some exotic thing wrapped in ndanus or grape leaves—what does it mat? The feeling of Christmas can grace any ard.

Christmas is not only in the mind, but is a rt of the heart. The family gathers, the ace is said, and somehow one feels the eat strength of hope and faith, like a tide ing above the problems of our time, a lief in God's world.

As always, I snuff the candles Christmas ght when the house creaks into quiet. I eck to be sure nobody has left a turkey ne where Holly can get to it. The colored bons and tissues are swept up, but there always a few I can gather and lay on the wing embers. I let the dogs out, and they e in new-fallen snow. They nip it up and it, they roll in it.

As I turn to the fire, my Honey pads behind me. Although she died a time ago, she is there, padding on velvet paws. She helps me shut the house up for the night. I see her golden tail wagging, just a small feather of a cocker tail. Some might say this is foolish, for she was, after all, only a dog, and she is dead. But the fourteen years of love and loyalty she gave me are very much alive. Good night, Honey.

The house talks, as old houses do. A beam creaks. A chair rocks. A floor sighs. I like this, for it reminds me of all the lives that have been lived in this house in the past. I feel a friendly presence as I poke the embers on the big hearth. The Christ child's candle burns steadily. The candle is modern wax but the flame, I reflect, is exactly as flame was in a tallow dip long ago.

Christmas is over. It is time to burn the wrappings, write the thank-you notes, return the calls, set the house in order for the New Year. It is also time to consider where our lives are bound, to what destination do we set forth? What purpose steadies our course? How much have we helped our fellow men? What good have we done? How often have we prayed? If Christmas means anything, it means good will to all. I doubt many of us really live up to that, but we can try.

As I go to the door to see how deep the snow is, I smell the snow. The walk is silver, the picket fence wears pointed caps. Night herself is luminous with the soft-falling snow. No two snowflakes, I am told, are exactly alike, and with millions of them coming down, it seems incredible. How can anyone be sure of this? A flurry comes in the open door and melts on the wide floor board. The intricate shapes are gone, only a spot of water remains.

It is not very practical to stand in an open doorway at midnight with snow blowing in. But it has been my habit for a good many years to close Christmas Day with a thought for all the people in the world, those I know well and love, and those I shall never see. It is not enough to consider those in the small house which is home. A self-contained life is only half a life. So, as I close the door, I repeat again my Christmas message:

God rest you merry, gentlemen.

n Appleyard Center our parties are defiely family style. There are great-grandmoth-, and infants wrapped up like cocoons. All s toast marshmallows and pop corn, and l molasses taffy. Our skiing neighbors come fresh from a day on the lift at Mad River, nging a big succulent ham, glazed with Ver- maple syrup, as their contribution to the st. My brother Hugh's wife, Emily, makes ig vegetable salad in the true and traditional pleyard style, and my sister Sally creates a h of golden, bubbling perfection—her casole of scalloped oysters and mushrooms. e conversation is rising to that steady pitch t means a good party. We are all so glad to one another, and especially in winter, appreciating the effort it takes to gather boots, mittens, hats and snow suits for a large family and to negotiate the snowy roads successfully! I ask my skiing neighbor just how she achieved such perfection of beauty with her noble ham, and she is delighted to tell me.

BAKED HAM—VERMONT STYLE

Take a 12–14-pound smoked tenderized ham. Carefully trim off most of the skin, leaving skin on the shank end. Score the fat in a crisscross pattern, stud here and there with cloves, and paint it all over with maple syrup. Put it in a large open roasting pan and bake it in a slow oven, 325° F., allowing 20 minutes to the pound. Around it pour 1 cup maple syrup mixed with ½ cup fizzy cider, and baste the ham every 10 minutes with this mixture. When the ham is baked, decorate it to your holiday taste with bright red candied cherries before serving.

Sounds of music and dancing drift in from the music room, paneled in old silvery-gray barn boards; in the winter kitchen there are knots and drifts of people who like to get as close to the heart of the house—the kitchen—as possible. I begin to carry our white ironstone plates into the dining room, where the food will be set out on the long table, on an old-fashioned red-and-white woven cloth, serve-yourself style. Hugh is slicing the spiced beef—it falls in slow transparent rosy slivers, waiting for the feathery biscuits. At one end of the table glows Emily's vegetable salad, on a broad silver platter.

APPLEYARD CENTER VEGETABLE SALAD

The maker of such a salad needs an eye for color, and a big platter, preferably round. Have tender fresh vegetables for this, if you can. If fresh are not available, use frozen and canned. Marinate for 2 hours in a sharp French dressing, 1½ cups each sliced cooked beets, carrots, wax beans and peas, each in a separate bowl. Wrap a whole small head of cauliflower in cheesecloth and poach until tender. Marinate this in the French dressing also. Peel and slice 3 rosy tomatoes. Sprinkle with a little basil. One large stalk of cooked broccoli can be marinated, also, as well as 1 cup diced crisp celery. Chill all these vegetables well before arranging on the platter. You will need 3 hard-cooked eggs, sliced also. Drain the vegetables well, then start with the head of cauliflower in the center of the tray. Put a ring of carrots around it. Then in the next row alternate the peas, beans, beets and celery in little mounds. The final row will be tomato slices and hard-cooked eggs. Garnish with romaine and sprinkle the whole plate with chopped chives. Serve with a bowl of cold commercial sour cream mixed with a little mayonnaise, dry mustard and a touch of grated onion.

Cynthia, my fifteen-year-old, who takes a serious interest in cooking pleasing to her mother and grandmother, has been watching her Aunt Sally reheat her scalloped-oyster-and-mushroom casserole. "I'd like the rule," she says intensely to my sister, and Sally murmurs the ingredients and amounts for

SCALLOPED OYSTERS AND MUSHROOMS

Sally begins by draining 48 oysters, setting aside the liquor. Then she slices ¾ pound mushroom caps and sautés them with 1½ tablespoons grated onion in 2 tablepoons butter until the mushrooms are tender. She has on hand 1½ cups cracker crumbs and the same amount of dried French-bread crumbs. These she now seasons with ¾ teaspoon salt, ⅛ teaspoon pepper, the same of nutmeg and a generous ⅛ teaspoon dry savory. She stirs in ¾ cup melted butter, 3 tablespoons heavy cream and some of the liquor from the oysters. She says the mixture should not be too wet, nor too dry either. Cynthia says that's not much help, so Sally admits it was about ¼ cup. She next butters a shallow glass baking dish and puts a thin layer of crumbs on the bottom, on top of that a layer of oysters and mushrooms mixed, then another layer of crumbs, the rest of the oysters and mushrooms, and then the remaining crumbs. She says you should use a dish big and shallow enough—9″x12″x2″—so you will have only two layers of oysters. If you have more layers, the outer ones will be overcooked or the inner ones will be half raw. She dots a little more butter over the top and bakes the dish for 30 minutes in a moderately hot, 375° F., oven. It will serve 8 generously, more at a party supper where, after all, there is a limit to what plates and guests will hold.

Children who have been exploring the secret stairs seem to sense that the moment for serving is at hand, and clatter down the steps in Civil War caps and tall beaver hats. "I am a volcano," announces Camilla, my youngest. Never did a volcano smile so sweetly, or put away so quickly so many biscuits, slices of ham, and cookies. Plates are loaded and rapidly emptied. The wintry season sharpens all our appetites as we think of the frosty ride home and just a little something more to fortify ourselves. If a car or sleigh should slide off the road, it's well to be prepared internally. I have my eye on some of mother's famous tomato marmalade, to go with my slice of ham—this is how she makes it:

TOMATO MARMALADE

To make 4 pint jars, Mrs. Appleyard needs 4 quarts ripe tomatoes, measured whole, 3 oranges, 3 lemons, ½ ounce stick cinnamon, 3 whole cloves, 1 cup seedless raisins, sugar, salt to taste. She peels the tomatoes by holding them over the gas flame until they pop and sizzle, peels off the skin and slices them. There will be a good deal of juice. She pours off about a pint of it and chills it to drink or to use in soup. Now she measures the rest of the tomatoes and puts an equal amount of sugar to heat in a very slow oven with the door open. She slices the oranges and lemons thin and cuts the slices into quarters with scissors. She ties the spices in a bag and puts them into a large preserving kettle with the tomatoes, lemons, oranges and salt to taste. When the juice begins to bubble, she adds the heated sugar. She cooks the marmalade stirring it often until the juice begins to crinkle when tested on a saucer. Then she turns off the heat and leaves it overnight. The next morning she reheats it till it just starts to boil, stirring it gently from the bottom, puts it into sterilized jars and seals them. She serves it with cold meat, fish or curry, or whenever anyone says, "Have you got some of that delicious tomato marmalade in the cellarway?"

TELL ME

By BARBARA SHOOK

Tell me the wind is but a whimper—
Low the flame that leaps the grate;
Tell me that lightning's but a simple
Evidence of starlit fate.
On the rooftop beats the rain.
Bend my ear
Far from fear
And tell me spring will come again.

Tell me the grass will green as pure—
Not from fear the lambs are bleating;
Tell me the sun will shine as sure—
Not from doubt the darkness, sleeting.
Thunder breaks beyond the door.
Hold me tight
Far from night
And tell me we will love once more.

so on. Our trimmings are cranberry and popcorn chains, paper flowers made by the various children, well-loved family ornaments grown slightly seedy with the years. (Each Christmas we buy a special new ornament and pray the kittens don't pick that one to bat around the room.) Mother's delicious candied applesauce, all innocent and golden, occupies a cut-glass compote on the dining table, beside a cake plate with my Florentines and fruitcake.

CANDIED APPLESAUCE

When my mother is asked for this rule she says gently, "Of course I'll give you the rule, but I can't give you the tree." Her apple tree is at least a hundred years old. It is never sprayed, pruned or fertilized. It takes every other year off, looking as sulky and tired of life as a tree can look. The next year it is a fragrant fountain of pink and white, a resort for bees for miles around in the spring, and in August is hung with candy-striped pale gold globes of tart sweetness. She puts what she always hopes will be a two-year supply of applesauce into her freezer. So far she has underestimated with great regularity. Mix together in a large heavy kettle 3 cups sugar and 2 cups water. Season with 4 whole cloves, ¼ teaspoon cinnamon and ⅛ teaspoon nutmeg. Peel and core 12 large green apples; cut into eighths. Add all at once to the sugar and water. Cover and bring slowly to a boil. Simmer, uncovered, gently. Stir only from tim to time to keep the apples from completel cooking apart. When the apples turn tran parent, the sauce is done. Cool. These qua tities make 2 quarts.

FLORENTINES

I first encountered these delicious wafers i England, on the most elegant tea tables, an have always felt since then that they we worth struggling through fog and sleet t meet socially. For these I take 1 cup mixe candied fruits and peels—a third of it che ries—chop them fine, and mix them with cup finely chopped sultana raisins and ⅓ cu finely chopped almonds. In a saucepan I me ¼ cup butter, ¼ cup sugar, 1 tablespoon ligh corn syrup and 1 teaspoon lemon juice. I to the fruit in ½ cup sifted flour and stir it int the mixture in the saucepan. Now I drop te spoonfuls on a buttered baking sheet, leavin plenty of room between, and flatten the slightly with the bottom of a wet tumbler. cook them 8–10 minutes in a moderate, 350 F., oven till they have stopped sizzling an are a deep golden brown with crisp lacy edge the fruit showing like jewels in the middle. let them stand a minute, lift them from th pan with a spatula and set them on a wi rack. When they are cool sometimes I tur them over and frost the flat undersides wit semisweet chocolate bits melted over water- one package will do the lot. This makes dozen. They can be frozen or will keep in cool place for two weeks.

APPLEYARD FRUITCAKE

Many people feel that fruitcake is not frui cake unless the fruit is soaked in brand This cake is delicious either way. For tho who want brandy, put 1 pound each seede and seedless raisins, 1 cup currants and cups candied fruit peels in a bowl and pou over this 1 cup brandy. Cover and let stan overnight.

If you choose to omit this part of the rec ipe, proceed by sifting together 4 cups flou 2 teaspoons cinnamon, 1 teaspoon each nu meg and clove and ½ teaspoon each salt an baking soda. Add 2 cups whole filberts and si ½ cup flour over all. Cream 1½ cups butte with 2½ cups sugar. Add 6 eggs, one at time, beating well after each. Add ½ cu dark molasses and beat the mixture unt well combined. (While this is going on, lin three 9″x5″x3″ loaf pans with oiled brown pa per or wax paper.) To the fruit mentione above, with or without brandy, add ½ cu flour and mix well. Then pour over the bu ter, egg and sugar mixture. Mix well. The add the flour mixture alternately with ¼ cu strong coffee if you used the brandy and cup if you did not. Divide the batter eveni among the 3 pans. Bake for 1 hour in a slo oven, 275° F. Reduce the heat to 250° F. an bake 1 hour and 45 minutes longer. The cak will be done when it is golden brown an pulls slightly away from the pan. Keep a pa of hot water on the bottom of the oven t keep the bottoms of the cakes from brow ing too fast. Remove the cakes from the pa and liners and cool them thoroughly. Wra them and store for several weeks before serv ing. Makes 5½ pounds fruitcake—3 gene ous 9″x5″x3″ loaves.

1956 Our last-Christmas picture. Every year we vow we'll never sit for one again. Wyman shouts, the children cry, I cry, and eventually the photographer almost does.

NOT FOR SALE

The life of the Rileys— a Christmas story in twelve acts.

By MARJORIE WESTERN RILEY

Along about five o'clock, when the confusion reaches a crescendo, I decide that I am psychologically unequipped to be the mother of seven children, and co-owner, with my equally unequipped husband, of a seventeen-room, run-down old white elephant of a house.

How we ever got ourselves into this remarkable predicament is a puzzle even to us. We started out fairly intelligent, rather literary (we thought) newspaper people, living in a tidy two-room apartment.

There's no use writing an autobiography covering the years between then and now; the usual things happened—the war, a baby now and then. Somewhere along the way we had the misfortune to fall in love with a house.

It was no passing fancy. I don't know what my husband thought when we first stood in the entry of the big old twin-gabled house high on the Georgia Street hill in Vallejo, California, but I had a vague and wonderful dream of having all three floors filled with very old furniture and very young children. A sort of vision of little girls in rose-papered rooms under the attic eaves and little boys with bear rugs on the floors, and rainy days, and oatmeal cookies baking in the oven.

"It has four fireplaces," I said faintly. "It has an attic and a back stairway. It has five bathrooms."

Wyman concedes that their house is family asset. "It will equip the children for anything— including life on an alligator farm."

HOW AMERICA LIVES

1945 Just after the war we were paying $90 a month for a miserable little house and dreaming of a home. Wyman balked: "I don't have $16,000."

1946 And so we bought it. The next year it had furniture in only one room—where we took the pictures.

1947 By the second Christmas Tim was six months old. Margaret is holding him. We've since throw away that fat old chair.

My husband had about him the peculiar look of a man who is backed into a corner, trapped, his destiny interwoven, once and forever, with a house.

"We have no furniture," he said. "I can't afford it. Why, there must be a hundred light globes alone to buy. There is something almost indecent about any house with five bathrooms."

The sunlight slanted through the tall, narrow windows on either side of the front door, glinting on the dark, waxy floors. Although devoid of furniture, the house had an aura of beauty. One entire side of the big dining room was a glittering expanse of French doors and ceiling-to-floor windows, opening out onto a flagstoned terrace. The old oak paneling and crisserossed beams in the room had been refinished in a driftwood gray—just the natural wood, grayed somehow, and waxed. It was no ordinary dining room.

I envisioned enormous Thanksgiving dinners, with chrysanthemums and candles, and little children sitting on chairs made high enough with books and pillows. I saw two-year-old Brendan sailing boats in the little wading pool in the shady garden beyond the terrace. I said, with the sweet reasonableness of a woman with three children and the fourth on the way:

"We can manage somehow. We must have this house."

He was the most wonderful newspaperman in the state of California. He was fresh from the service, and we had a lifetime before us in which nothing but glorious things could possibly happen.

"Marjorie," he protested, his eyes swimming with love for the redwood-paneled study with the little black brick fireplace, and the bookshelves all the way around just waiting for all his books, "sixteen thousand dollars is an awful lot of money. I don't have sixteen thousand dollars. I can't get sixteen thousand dollars. I know you want a home—but —— "

It was an awful lot of house. And an awful lot of money. He was just out of the Navy. He had a few hundred dollars in severance pay, and a weekly pay check of $100. He said something about taxes and upkeep.

I was imbued with that wonderful optimism common to pregnant CONTINUED ON PAGE 131

"I wanted to found a dynast

1951 Sixth Christmas... all the children rebelled at posing in pajamas in the doorway. I don't blame them.

1952 The seventh Christmas we got into the act. The old gilt mirror hangs over the ancient piano in the living room. Tim was just beginning to come down with diabet d you can't found a dynasty in a two-bedroom house."

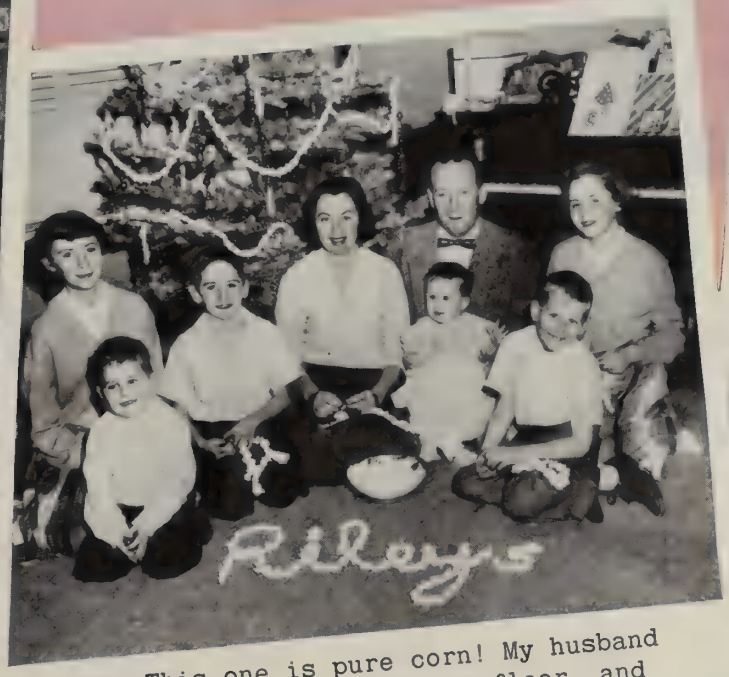
948 Tim was eighteen months old and an accomplished scene stealer when the third Christmas in the old house rolled around.



1949 Margaret and Ellen had just had their tonsils out three days before this picture was taken on the landing. The star is a light fixture.

1950 By the fifth Christmas we had Michael. If Tim looks a little put out by the fat lump of a Mike—well, he is. Ellen is holding him.

3 It seemed too good to be true that we were all together the eighth Christmas. Tim has had a bad bout with diabetes. (That's him with the missing tooth.) My mother died and three weeks later Sheila was born. It was a full year.

1954 This one is pure corn! My husband refused to sit on the floor, and is still mad about it! He's a difficult man—and one of the funniest!

1955 This picture—the tenth Christmas in our old house—was delayed a little by Megan. If we all look a little bedraggled. . .I guess we were—especially me.

- 4 eggs

Heat to boiling, water, shortening and salt in heavy saucepan. Quickly stir in flour and oats. Stir vigorously over low heat about 2 minutes, or until mixture forms a ball. Remove from heat. Add unbeaten eggs one at a time, beating after each addition until smooth and satiny. Drop by teaspoons on greased cookie sheet about an inch apart. Bake in hot oven (400°F.) 30 to 35 minutes. Remove from cookie sheets; cool; cut off tops. Fill with your favorite lobster salad. Makes 40.

DATE-BLENDED OATMEAL

Here's a brand new kind of oatmeal! And a new taste delight! It's an intriguing new way for youngsters (and grownups) to get the high-protein benefits of good hot oatmeal. The flavor of chopped dates or other fruit blended into the oatmeal during the cooking—deliciously flavors every spoonful of creamy oatmeal. Try it!

Follow oatmeal recipe on package for 4 to 6 servings. During cooking, stir in ½ cup chopped dates. Each serving may be garnished with halved dates.

women. After all, houses in the most ordinary subdivisions were selling for $16,000 and more. I had a sort of wordless dream about having a great, noisy Irish family, with wedding receptions and holiday reunions and all that. A dynasty. And you can't found a dynasty in a two-bedroom modern house with no fireplace. If my husband belonged to that most insecure and vagrant of all professions, the newspaper profession, that just made it all the more necessary that we should behave and live in a most permanent manner.

About that time, my husband was called back into the Navy to act as Admiral Blandy's press officer on the first atom-bomb test. I needed no further proof that God was on my side; with him out of the way, all practical opposition to the house—staggering, by anybody's measure—was removed.

Where the $4000 down payment came from is so complicated that I dare not go into details, even if I could remember all of them. It is enough to say that two relatives, one my brother, and one my mother-in-law, came to the rescue when all seemed lost, with the loan of the cash, and only my fervent promise to repay as security.

The bank officials, unimpressed with their investigation of our financial status, asked fearfully if the $4000, appearing as it did out of the blue, had "any strings attached." I replied that there were none. After all, there were none, except that the Rileys were to eat an awful lot of spaghetti and hamburger the next forty months while repaying the big sum, and that I considered purely a personal matter.

The FHA men looked bleakly at the clauses about the age of the house to be insured, and I said, "I'm sure it cannot be more than twenty years old," while every weathered shingle and every lofty beamed ceiling proclaimed the words sheer fantasy. I learned later that the house had dominated the Georgia Street hill a full fifty years, but the massive beams and brick foundations must have convinced everybody that it was destined to at least finish out the century.

We moved in, and the house echoed with emptiness, even with three children. I ached with desire to furnish it, and was stopped only by the fact that we had no money. Really no money. We closed off the living room for two years and called it the ballroom, and sometimes on rainy days the children ran and played there.

I haunted junk shops and read classified ads. I discovered there is a type of furniture, big and bulky and marble-topped, termed, vaguely, "Victorian," which nobody much wants, and when we had a few spare dollars I would drag home a piece. I bought a massive Steinway square piano which took four men to cart into the house, and which struck my husband dumb with incoherent rage for nearly as many days.

The furniture in our bedroom came from the home of a sweet little ninety-year-old woman who died one day, and her son said I could have it all for $100.

"Can I give you twenty-five dollars a month for four months?" I said, and he said yes, of course; he had no place for the furniture. So we ate some more hamburger, and my husband remarked sadly that from a free and footloose newspaperman he seemed to be fast becoming a man weighed down by a number of things, both inanimate and animate. By then the fourth little Riley, Timothy, was here, and the fifth little Riley on the way.

A lovely woman sold us another roomful of bedroom furniture—walnut twin beds, a gigantic but beautiful wardrobe, marble-topped night stands, a chest and a dresser with jewel drawers in which I keep safety pins—for $200. Her mother had brought it back from Germany eighty years or so ago, and it had a wonderful European look about it—just right for a storybook house.

Anyway . . . here we are, ten years later, I in my extremely late thirties and my husband a little over the line into the next decade, the somewhat reluctant heads of a teeming household that has left both of us physical, mental, emotional and financial wrecks. Beside us, the clan in The Whiteoaks of Jalna looks sickly and pallid indeed.

In a way I blame it on my grandmother. She had a serene, unruffled way about her and used to paint her own kitchen every spring even when she was past ninety. Not white, either, but red and yellow and blue and green, befitting a little old lady of spirit. She had ten children, and I think probably had lost track of the number and names of all her grandchildren. She sort of generated peace, and it used to make me feel good just to look at her.

You might think, since my grandmother was my ideal, that God would have been kind enough to endow me with her temperament and virtues. He did nothing of the sort. He gave me the desire to be an Ideal Mother, all right, but to fulfill it a wretched disposition, a dislike for noise, an aversion to a kitchen range, dizzy spells when I look at dirty dishes, and a friendly tolerance for cobwebs hanging from the ceiling. About my only qualification is that I can type.

When my husband points out, reasonably enough, that I should be an example to my daughters, in the matter of dusting, house cleaning, sewing, cooking, and the like, I tell him I am resigned to being a Horrible Example. Through observing me, they can learn what to avoid in their own adult lives.

As for all those wonderful things I was going to accomplish—well, I've sunk so low that now I'm congratulating myself just because I don't give way to a nervous breakdown. I'm willing to admit that life, like my family and my house, is considerably bigger than I am.

Strangely enough, our oldest daughters, Margaret and Ellen, seventeen and sixteen, when they aren't chasing boys, talking on the telephone or putting their hair up in pin curls, show rather surprising domestic talents.

In their turquoise sewing room on the third floor, furnished with odds and ends painted pale yellow (don't ever paint an old treadle sewing machine; it never stops sticking), they turn out a wardrobe that leaves me wordless with admiration.

They put in zippers and tucks and gussets and make Capri pants and Bermuda shorts, and even, this past summer, tackled bathing suits with stays. The suits looked wonderful until they wore them in the water, whereupon they filled up like balloons. The girls ended up with $20 elasticized models from a downtown shop, because—well, I thought their efforts to create should be rewarded. That old milk bill was too big to pay with $40 anyway.

Both Margaret and Ellen have, just as in my long-ago dream, quaint little rooms with sloping ceilings opening off the sewing room. In the dream, I don't recall seeing the assortment of hoop skirts, Orlon sweaters, tennis rackets, ski shoes and phonograph records which now litters the floor to a depth of eighteen inches or so—but that's the nice thing about having them up on the third floor: I don't have to look at their rooms; just stay downstairs and pretend that all is as it was in the dream.

There is a tiny room papered with pink rosebuds and furnished with a little pink-painted bed and bureau waiting for Sheila, who is only three and a half and still a little reluctant about sleeping way up there by herself. The only third-floor room still unoccupied is one which contains a big old tank which used to be used for an auxiliary water supply. Eventually it will be a room for Megan, who is eighteen months old, and serenely indifferent to interior decorating.

On the second floor is the family sitting room, papered in deep red paper with little Victorian ladies riding bicycles, and with ruffled muslin curtains. A little carved barrel-back sofa and matching chairs are covered in a dull green cotton, and there are a lot of books, mostly the children's—really very attractive. We sit there and watch Ed Sullivan and Disneyland and Playhouse 90, and once in a while, when all nine of us are there, all together, I feel such a surge of affection for them that I almost go right downstairs and bake them peanut-butter cookies. Almost.

Also on the second floor is Timothy's room. Timothy is nine years old, with blue eyes, a butch haircut, freckles and a talent for business. When he's tired of his old toys he sets up a store in the back alley and sells them to the neighbor children. He starts out every day with a needleful of insulin in his arm, having fallen heir to diabetes when he was five. Whom he inherited it from we can't imagine, but I suppose some remote ancestor handed it on down to him.

My idea of pure happiness would be to watch Tim eat a big wedge of cake with fudge frosting and four scoops of ice cream with caramel sauce on top. His, too, poor lamb. How he hates raw carrots and all the other pallid stuff that is the lot of a diabetic!

It seems to me almost comical that anyone so averse to cooking and meal planning and calories as I should have the never-ending problem of keeping an active, diabetic child on a sugar-free diet. I do it, but there's no use trying to be noble and say I like it.

Tim's room is a joy. It's all windows, like a solarium, with a peaked ceiling. Windows, uncurtained, open out to an enormous walnut tree—lacy green in summer, bare brown branches etched against the sky in winter.

Everything, walls and furniture alike, is painted a soft, sandalwood color. The furniture was so disreputable to begin with that I thought painting it like the walls would make it unobtrusive. It turned out to be a most interesting and effective room. Tim has a black bear rug (full of moths, and perfectly horrible) on the floor. I have vague plans for getting rid of it someday, but since at present he is somewhat fonder of it than he is of me, I hesitate to bring the matter up.

There is a bathroom between Tim's room and Mike's. So far, Mike's room is without distinction, principally because he hasn't started collections, except of hand-me-downs, as the other children have. He collects all the old junk his brothers get tired of, with the result that you can hardly get into his room. He's also collected Sheila, aged three, who sleeps in his lower bunk while he sleeps in the top one.

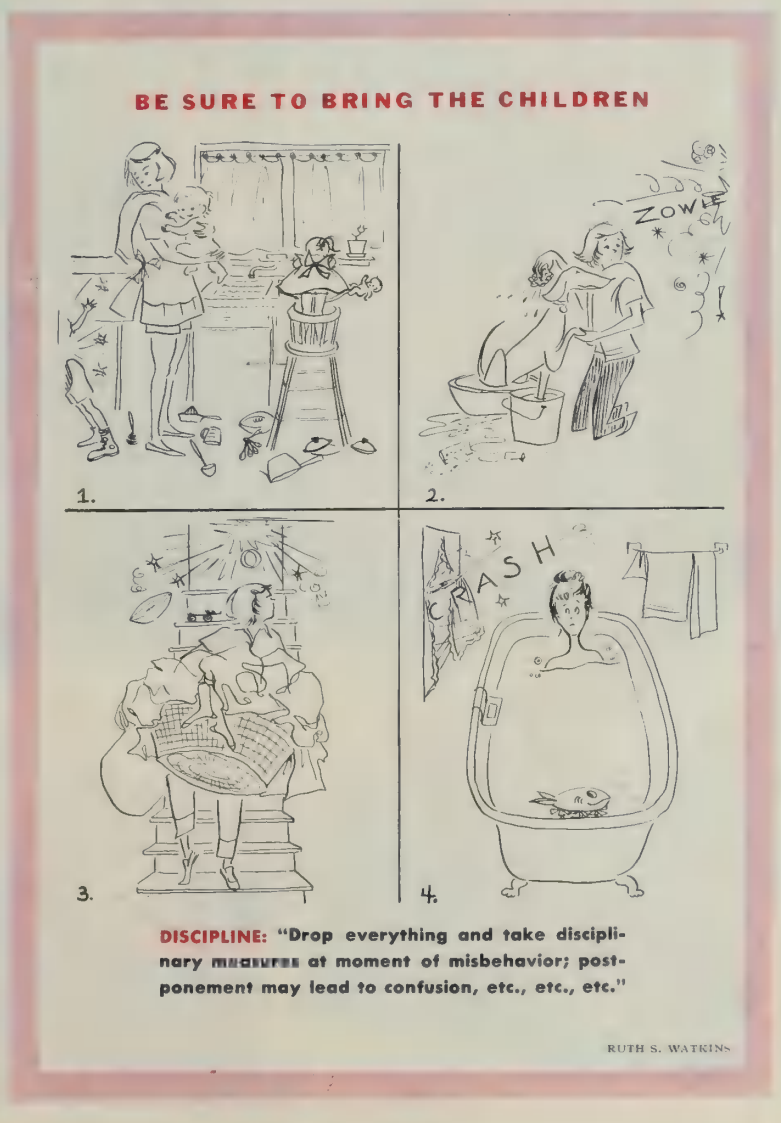
Sheila loves Mike with a selfless and complete love, and he loves her in a big-brotherly, amused way that is sweet to behold. The devotion of these two little people seems to me most unique in this big, bickering, temperamental, opinionated family. Just to be with Mike is all Sheila asks.

Across the front of the house on the second floor are my husband's and my own rooms. Since he is tidy by nature and always picks up his clothes, I'm glad he has the luxury of his own room. With the cocoa-brown wallpaper, heavy old furniture, plain white draperies and woodwork, the room has an uncluttered, masculine look about it. Only touch of whimsey is the strip depicting the Four Seasons, above his built-in closet and cabinets.

My room is filled with a hopeless litter of clothes, unfinished manuscripts of Great American Novels, the beautiful old German furniture, and immense, billowy white ruffled cotton-lace curtains, the price of which I have never yet admitted to my husband, even after six years.

I papered it myself (after buying the curtains I had no money left to pay a paper hanger) in a little provincial wallpaper with a black background and a pink-and-white geometric design. Someday I'll find a pink rug (on sale) that will just fit the floor, and match the lovely little pink dressing room adjoining.

In the course of painting the woodwork in my room, I began to churn with indignation because my husband won't help with such worth-while chores. I suggested the following compromise, which still seems to me fair and just:



DIVISION OF LABOR

Oh, I'll do the painting,
A job I adore;
If you will clean up
What I spill on the floor.

This met with only the most unenthusiastic response, and the brief explanation that he is a newspaperman, not a painter.

In this room, in turn, our babies live in the first year or so of their lives, before being ejected into the swirling tides of life that flow just outside the door. There's even a rocking chair, and for the first three months or so after a baby is born I just sit and rock back and forth with the little one in my arms, mpervious to the racket and the clatter of the older ones. They all stay out of my room unless they are invited to come in.

On the landing is a lovely old statue of Mary, which for a hundred years was in an old Dominican convent, now torn down, here in Vallejo. She is my favorite possession. Our Protestant friends look warily at it, privately fearing, I think, that since forsaking their ranks to join the Catholic church four years ago I have now come to the worship of idols. Even my husband calls the landing "St. James Cathedral." Here, after the hectic day, we all gather briefly to say a decade of the rosary each night.

I can't say the children always come happily (except Mike), especially if they're watching a good television program, but they come, and I, at least, find the little nightly ritual oddly reassuring. We have lived through another day, after being scattered like leaves all over town, at school, at work, shopping, swimming, crossing busy streets—all the things a big family does—and here, for a few minutes, we are all together, on the little ten-foot-square landing, saying together, "Hail, Mary, full of grace ——"

What thoughts go through the children's heads at this time I have no idea. By the expressions on their faces I doubt that they're too spiritual. Sheila frequently puts on her clown act, and the other children all start laughing at Skip, our fool dog, who sits up on his haunches, front paws drooping as he looks soulfully around, for all the world as if he's saying his prayers too.

I'm usually filled with an emotion combining about equal parts of thankfulness for the day lived through and the hope that the next night, twenty-four hours hence, will find us all here again.

On down the paneled stairs is the long front entry, painted oyster white, from which open the library, the living room and the dining room. All these rooms have fireplaces, as does my husband's upstairs.

Once, years ago, we had a party, and I lit the fires in the three downstairs rooms before the first guests arrived, failing to take into consideration the fact that we had only one fire screen, in the living room. My husband had to dash from room to room with the screen as the blazes danced high, to keep from turning the place into an inferno.

In the living room now, in addition to the old rosewood square piano, are some exquisite gold frames, two with mirrors and four with paintings, an old chest with a brown marble top, an old love seat with a great high back and wings, and a lush and lovely sage-green rug which I devoutly wish were paid for.

The walls and woodwork alike are painted the same oyster white as the entry, and the draperies are a cotton brocade in the same off-white shade.

The study has two old linen-covered wing chairs—English hunting scenes—that belonged to my husband's mother. They sort of go with the little paintings of hunting scenes, above the bookcases, that also used to be in my husband's childhood home. He says they're the first memory he has; they hung in the dining room, and he used to gaze at them as he ate baked Alaska and chicken pie and twenty-egg angel cake and all the other wonderful things he always remembers from that magical era on nights I serve him hamburger sandwiches.

In the dining room is the little maple open cupboard filled with pink Spode that we got when we were first married. The high-backed dining chairs came to California in the gold-rush days. We bought eight of them for $20 from a man here in Vallejo who had them stuck away in an old shed. In a fine frenzy of energy I refinished them (they were painted). Never again. They stand as a monument to my solitary achievement in the backbreaking field of furniture refinishing. The drop-leaf table we have outgrown, and someday we hope to find a big old walnut Victorian dining set, with a marble-topped buffet.

Outside the dining room is a redwood terrace, built to follow the contour of the doors, and bordered with a built-in planter for pink ivy geranium.

Originally the terrace was stone, but the combined weight of the rock and the years was too much. It fell apart. We stumbled around over it for years, and finally Frank, who does everything for us from painting to whittling out toy guns for Mike and Sheila, took all the old stone and built a rather incredible patio, forty feet long, in the big area where lawn wouldn't grow because we never took care of it. It's the most beautiful patio I ever saw.

Beyond it is a wading pool for the little ones; in back of it is a sunken garden (well, it would be a garden if I had time to set out some plants in it) and above it reach the unkempt branches of huge redwood trees and oaks which do nothing but shower tons of debris down on any poor plant that has the temerity to even try to grow.

The children sleep in the garden all summer long. They pretend that the roar of traffic along busy Georgia Street, just below, is actually the roar of water, and that the garden is far off somewhere in the mountains. It's amazing the feeling of being away from the world we have, just twenty feet or so above the city's noisiest street.

The kitchen seemed enormous when we first moved in, but now I wish it were twice as big. It's painted white, with a pale turquoise ceiling. Over the range (a beautiful double-oven affair to encourage the girls to bake) is pasted up a découpage of bright-colored birds cut from a great stack of Audubon prints I'd saved for years. The birds sort of symbolize my attitude toward cooking in particular and housework in general.

Off the kitchen is the back hall, which leads to the back porch.

En route, doors open, first, to the joy of my life: a great big laundry room with a glistening automatic washer and dryer. I say the room is a joy because all the dirty clothes—at least three tubs a day—can be dumped there and the door closed, keeping the offensive sight from the critical eyes of more tidy passers-by.

Farther down the hall is Brendan's room. It is a sunny, window-filled room with its own bath, officially designated "maid's quarters" by the real-estate man who sold us the house. I'd like to see a maid get it from Brendan, who, at twelve, has acquired a collection of priceless belongings that, like the laundry, I am happy to have out of sight. He, too, has a bear rug, even more horrendous than Timothy's, and as greatly loved.

Brendan leaves the house each morning at five on his paper route, and wakes me each morning at seven when he comes upstairs to give me the morning paper (which my husband has more-or-less edited a few hours earlier) along with a good-morning kiss. At four in the afternoon he goes out on his route again; in one year he has put $462 in the bank—an achievement we have not been able to equal in eighteen years of married life.

He's saving for college, seeming to realize already, with a wisdom over and above his age, that by the time his older sisters get through school and engagement parties and weddings, there will be mighty few gold pieces left in the old family treasure chest.

Needless to say, in a household such as ours, there is never any money. I find myself in the position of feeling a little sorry for our friends who are always so concerned with stocks and bonds and dividends and profit and losses and taxes and all that dull stuff. If you have no money to worry about, you find all sorts of interesting things to occupy your mind. Chief among them, how to get some money.

My husband actually makes a good salary. Without his eight millstones around his neck, he could drive a sports convertible, belong to the country club and wear pale yellow imported Italian suits to and from the San Francisco Press Club. As it is, he drives a bulky, family-sized station wagon, wears his suits until they shine like the noonday sun, and spends what leisure time he has trying to catch his breath so he can go back to work again.

Everywhere we look we see unfinished projects: cracked concrete in the retaining walls, missing shingles, acres of walls needing repainting, battered floors that need refinishing. One summer the plumbing all backed up in the five bathrooms and it took men four days to find the main line out in back. Ours had to be the one residence in town for which there was no map on file in the city engineer's office. The plumbers dug up the whole garden—the first and last time, incidentally, that there's been any digging to speak of done there. My husband is a great one to remind me I can't keep house, but to me it looks as if his education as a handy man was a little neglected too. He is the original "Well, call an electrician, dear," man if a light fuse needs to be replaced.

But despite the sorry state he's brought me to for giving him the best years of my life ("Best years!" he yelped, reading this over my shoulder. "If these are the best years, may God deliver me from the bad ones!") well despite that, I'm extremely fond of the man.

We agree about almost nothing. He says all the bad traits in the children came from my family and I say they all came from his. He claims all the children look like him, and I say they all look like me. Especially the pretty ones, which includes all four girls.

He says I'm "penny wise and pound foolish," and I say he's a spendthrift. Actually our purchases are by necessity limited to washing powder, pancake mix, toothbrushes and school shoes, once we've paid Mrs. Kelly, who keeps house because I'm too lazy to do it, and Frank, who I think averages about 7½ cents

"We spend $12,000 a year," says Priscilla. "Some years Paul makes more, sometimes we wind up minus. We have up to eighteen parties a month—for his oil-business friends. When it comes to groceries for just us (and four children), I'm the stingiest person I know!"

an hour for the endless hours he spends trying to carry out my plans for beautifying this old plantation.

Were our friends right who warned us about the pitfalls of buying a big old house? Of course they were right! We could keep a staff of four busy here with no trouble at all. Except with the authorities for paying them in counterfeit money.

Of course they were right! It would take a millionaire to keep up this place: to keep the 30-odd windows glistening and the 130 square yards of floor in the main downstairs rooms properly wall-to-wall carpeted.

Mealtime looks like the noon hour in a high-school cafeteria, despite the silver candlesticks, and the electric buzzer under the dining table. Just let anybody try to buzz me for faster service and he'll get the spaghetti right on top of his head.

Everybody was right! At the rate we're going, all our friends will be retiring to beach houses in Florida about the time we get the mortgage paid off. By then it'll be time to send Megan and Sheila to college.

Just when we want nothing but the soothing quiet of our graves, the grandchildren will all start rolling in for Christmas dinner with dear old grandmother and grandfather. If each of our children has as many children as we have, there will be forty-nine little tots here for the holidays.

We weren't cut out to be parents, and we weren't cut out to be grandparents. We aren't jolly, easygoing people, lovable and whimsical. We try to be, but the interior effort to just be civil is so great that anything more makes nervous wrecks out of us.

In any given twenty-four-hour period we break just about all the rules in all the books about rearing children. When I get to the point where I think I can't live longer than another day at the most, I say, "Let's go on a picnic," and off we go, loaded down with a picnic basket, for the hills, or the beach, or someplace. Regardless of how cross we've been, the magic word "picnic" seems to dispel all hard feelings. We get so tired we don't even have the strength to quarrel, so things are usually peaceful for a day or two afterward.

When I look at this great, sprawling house, and this great, troublesome family, I am willing to agree with the experts who have long since figured out that it's economically impossible to do what we're doing. I remember an incident when I was a little girl, when I nearly choked to death trying to swallow a piece of meat that was too big. That's exactly what I've done again, bitten off more than I can chew, and so has my husband.

We'll both agree that everybody is right, and we're wrong as wrong; but change things? Where would we begin? What year would we eliminate, or what child could we do without? Can we imagine life without Megan, or Sheila, or Michael, or Timothy, or Brendan or Ellen or Margaret? Can we imagine them sleeping two or three to a room, or growing up without a Secret Garden, or a back stairway for hide-and-seek, or an attic for rainy days?

We don't know why it seems so important to us that our children have an old-fashioned rearing in a big, old-fashioned house, but it just does.

People speak of the "sacrifice" entailed in having a big family. Do they mean giving up cocktail parties and weekends at Tahoe and that sort of thing? I was glad to give up those things; as a matter of fact, I found the gay life infinitely more tiring and exhausting than home life. And without its rewards. The rewards are so wonderful, even if they don't come too often, that there are no words to describe them.

Christmas holidays, for instance. They seem so sort of touched with magic in this house. We hang evergreen garlands all around the dining room, and cover the mantels with pine cones brought back from our summers at Bolinas. We have a formal tree in the living room, with all the decorations saved down the years—even the little broken spire off our first tree. We have a tree decorated with popcorn and paper chains and sequin-covered eggshells in the dining room. Margaret and Ellen play It Came Upon the Midnight Clear on the old square, out-of-tune piano, and the little children sing.

I feel, at such times, a great wave of affection for this old house, and forgive it for all the trouble it causes us. Leaving it would be like leaving one of the children. We just couldn't. As an investment it was the biggest financial error we'll ever make. We'll never make another because we'll never have any money to make one with; that commodity all disappears, like sand down a rathole, into the dim and dusty recesses of our home.

But do we regret it? Heavens, no! I love it all so that I just may place an advertisement, someday, in the newspaper that my husband edits, and which my son brings to me each morning:

"NOT FOR SALE: Huge old house, four fireplaces, five bathrooms (two don't work); heavily mortgaged, in need of paint, shingles and repairs of all kinds; filled with old furniture, children of varying sizes, one harassed housekeeper, overworked and underpaid, and enough crisp, unopened, unpaid bills to provide kindling all through the month of January . . . but filled, too, with a family's hopes, and dreams, and memories that they wouldn't trade for all the money in the world."

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

hard thing for me, and asked him to stay away from the party to demonstrate his loyalty. He refused. We argued the matter for weeks. Eventually we compromised.

"Josh agreed to eat dinner at the country club, take two drinks at the most, dance once and come home by ten P.M. After he left the house and the children were in bed I put up their Christmas tree by myself. It wasn't any fun. Ten o'clock came and went, but Josh didn't come. By half past ten I had begun to worry. At eleven o'clock I was frantic; one minute I would imagine a terrible traffic accident, the next minute I would picture Josh complimenting Marilyn or some other girl on her glamorous evening dress.

"At eleven-fifteen I telephoned the country club. The bank party was still in full swing. In the distance I could hear music and singing and people laughing. My call was answered by a waiter. It took forever, but finally Josh came to the phone and said in a cold, curt voice that he had been unavoidably delayed but would be home in fifteen minutes.

"He broke that promise too. It was half past twelve before he arrived. The moment he came weaving in I discovered the cause of the unavoidable delay. His face was plastered with lipstick; there was lipstick on his collar, there was lipstick in his hair. His hair was tousled where some girl had been running her fingers through it. His necktie was hanging out. There was lipstick on his necktie too.

"Josh had drunk so much he was incoherent. He mumbled something about the lipstick's being a joke, but that type of joke is not hilarious to me. I thought his behavior was a disgrace and I said so. I started off to bed and he grabbed my arm. I pulled loose. He lost his temper and hit me. Both our daughters—Sally is seven, Jane six—were awakened by the noise and came running in. It wasn't the first time Josh had hit me by any means. Sally and Jane knew the score immediately. Their reaction was pitiful. Sally threw herself in my arms and began to sob. Jane joined in. It took me hours to get them back to sleep. Josh collapsed on the living-room sofa and did his sleeping there.

"The next night was Christmas Eve. Josh and I decorated the tree together, but we were hardly speaking. Josh refused to apologize for his conduct or to admit he was in the wrong in any way. On Christmas afternoon we drove the children to see his mother, a trip of ninety miles, without exchanging a single word. By Hints collected by Mrs. Dan Gerber, mother of five . . .

Santa Claus Suggestions

One of the nicest things about babies is that they don't care how little Santa spends . . . it's the play value of a toy that counts. All manner of easy-to-grasp rattles or small plastic toys are inexpensive and fun for wee ones. Do-something toys, listen-to and cuddle toys are easy on the budget and enchanting for toddlers. A few toys can be more fun, less bewildering than a raft of playthings.

Short Story . . . Meat-y Subject

Holiday or any day, babies and toddlers need protein foods to provide strength and promote growth. Gerber Meats for Babies make it easy to give baby those all-important proteins. Made from savory, selected Armour cuts, they're carefully processed to eliminate most of the fat and coarse tissue for easy digestibility. Of course they're all pure meat, with just enough broth to enhance flavor and texture. ARMOUR

Safety Story for Christmas

A Christmas tree is a delight to behold, but with wee ones about, certain precautions should be taken.

- Base of tree should be broad, sturdy and securely anchored.
- Tree lights and sockets should be checked to see that they're in good condition.
- Aluminum foil icicles and breakable ornaments are best placed at the top of the tree.

Energy for Sale

You can't count calories where babies are concerned, because active babies need them for energy. That's why calorie-rich Gerber Baby Cereals are so good for your little one. What's more, baby gets other nutritional benefits from Gerber Cereals, because they're fortified with iron, calcium and B-vitamins.

Feature of the Month

Nogs are traditional for the Christmas season, so why not make one for a snack-begging toddler?

HOLIDAY NOG

2 tbs. Gerber Egg Yolks* — 1 can Gerber Orange Juice
1 cup cool milk — 1 tbs. sugar

Blend thoroughly and serve.
Yield: 2 servings.

*For a younger baby, Gerber Strained Egg Yolks are luscious served as is. Babies take to the custard-like texture, fresh-egg flavor, and they're rich in iron and vitamin A.

Calming Idea

With holiday excitement in the air, it's good to see that baby doesn't get over-stimulated. Reasonable firmness about bedtime and mealtime can make holidays happier for everyone.
And ■ Merry Christmas to you and yours from me and mine.

THE STRIDE RITE SHOE

Green Shoe Mfg. Co., Boston, Mass.

New Year's Day the strain in our house was terrific. The situation has now become unbearable. Sally and Jane are creeping around like little mice, afraid of their own shadows. Even three-year-old Tommy is affected.

"If the office party were an isolated incident, I suppose I could file and forget it, although it is difficult for me to forget an injury. Unfortunately, I have just about exhausted my capacity to forgive and forget. This latest quarrel between Josh and me is typical of our dismal, unsatisfying marriage. Josh and I have been wrangling and arguing for years.

"We had serious trouble in the town where we lived before we moved to Los Angeles a year ago. There was a woman in the bank there—another bleached blonde, incidentally—who almost pushed us to the brink of divorce. Josh got romantically involved with her and he confessed as much. I halfway thought he was deliberately trying to upset me and I halfway thought he really preferred Irene, the other woman, to me. Although I was deeply wounded, I didn't create a big dramatic scene as many wives would have done. I simply told Josh that unless he broke off the acquaintanceship permanently I would sue for a divorce. Josh took me at my word and broke with Irene. However, he complained bitterly at my very natural jealousy.

"Josh is twice as jealous as I am, and without reason. I have never given him the slightest cause. He feels affronted if I attend a P.T.A. meeting. He is jealous of my women friends. I try to confine visits to my neighbors to the daytime, although daytime visiting is very little pleasure. All of us have small children and we spend our time bobbing our heads and bobbing our eyes to see what the youngsters are doing.

"Josh refuses to visit or to entertain neighboring couples in the evening. Too tired, he says. Just last night I ran next door and stayed awhile and he flew into a jealous rage and locked me out of the house. It wasn't the first time either. We have no friends in common. We go practically nowhere. A drive-in movie once a month is big-time stuff for us.

"Josh thinks his companionship should satisfy and stimulate me. Yet he talks of nothing but his job and the bank and I've grown to detest the whole subject. There is prestige in Josh's job, I admit, but prestige won't support a family of five in this inflationary day and age. After eleven years of working in banks Josh earns $380 a month; that's no bonanza. He has to wear good clothes too. We can't afford to own our home. We rent a small, cramped house on an inconvenient street. Josh disapproves of installment buying, which means we do without nearly everything that other couples take for granted. We don't even own a washing machine. An electric iron is my most expensive piece of equipment. I'm still nursing along a pop-up toaster I bought when I was single. Our rattletrap car is ten years old and Josh needs it virtually all the time. Banking hours sound like a snap to the public, but Josh puts in endless overtime without extra pay and his irregular schedule won't allow him to join a car pool.

"I believe I could take the financial sacrifices in my stride—economizing is no new thing to me—if Josh would treat me with dignity and consideration. When he abuses me in the presence of our children, when he humiliates me before the neighbors, I want to curl up and die. There is an ache deep in my chest, in my heart. I feel physically sick. I hate him and I hate myself. I just can't understand what happened to Josh and me.

"When he and I started out together it appeared we had everything in our favor. Our backgrounds were similar. We were engaged for six months; we had plenty of time to talk over our hopes and our dreams. Both of us seemed to want the same things. We wanted a home and children. We wanted security and standing in the community. I wanted desperately to belong to somebody.

"After my mother's death, for many years I didn't seem to belong anywhere. One day I had a home and a place in the world and then my mother died of a coronary attack and in two weeks' time our family fell apart. My brother and my sisters were older and they scattered and my father couldn't take care of me. I stayed with four different aunts in succession and adjusted my ways to their ways, but none of them wanted to keep me. At sixteen I was sent to the Pacific Coast to live with my oldest sister. She was newly married and her husband objected to my coming; my bed was in the living room, but the walls were thin and night after night I would hear them in the bedroom arguing about me and my heart would nearly break. I finally moved in with a high-school classmate whose parents operated a greenhouse. I earned my keep by working in the greenhouse and nobody was ever unkind to me, but it wasn't my family, and I didn't feel I belonged there.

"When I met Josh I was nineteen and had my own one-room apartment. There was a peanut-sized kitchenette and I bought a big secondhand refrigerator for it just for the pleasure of seeing my own food on the shelves. I was working as a secretary and attending college in the evenings and cooking two meals a day as well. Josh, who shared a hall bedroom with another boy, proposed to me in that apartment. I had baked a meat loaf for him. As I set the meat loaf on the card table and began lighting the candles, he asked me.

"I was too awed and impressed at the idea of marrying a banker—as I thought of Josh in those days—to inquire into his prospects and the exact status of his income. I expected we would buy a house and furnish it and live on the scale other young couples lived. What I didn't know was that Josh's salary at the time was $180 a month, less than mine, and that after banking hours he was working part time as an usher in a motion-picture house. He was also taking college courses at night. He wiped out his savings account to buy my engagement ring, which was sweet of him, but it was foolish too. He needed the money to pay tuition charges.

"I didn't ever plan to be a career wife. I held my job out of sheer necessity until Sally was born. Even before that I was disillusioned with my marriage, although I did my best to conceal it. In my girlhood I learned not to air my feelings. Whenever possible I conceal my emotions. Josh is the opposite. He has no self-control whatever. When Sally was born he carried on at the hospital as though he were the mother. At the same time he showed plainly his disappointment that the baby wasn't a boy, something I will never forget. And when the baby and I came home and I stayed in bed and let him prepare his own breakfast, he was outraged and yelled so furiously all the neighbors heard him. He picks a quarrel over any triviality.

"The other morning Jane meddled in the tooth paste and he exploded and threw the child into such a nervous state she couldn't go to school. When Tommy misbehaves, Josh thinks it is cute. His partiality to our son is bad for all three of our youngsters.

"At best Josh has a hair-trigger temper. Some time ago he got into the habit of stopping at a neighborhood tavern on the way home. Drink makes his disposition completely unpredictable. One evening last month he came home very late—I'd already dished up supper—and I didn't offer a word of comment on his tardiness. Not one word. I did ask him to carry out the trash; merely that, nothing more. His response was to aim a blow at me. I jumped aside and Sally burst into tears. Jane rushed at her father and started beating at him with her little fists. Josh spanked and put both girls to bed without their supper.

"That night I locked myself in the bathroom and cried for hours. Josh and I don't seem to be capable of achieving companionship, tenderness, harmony. Living with him is killing my self-respect. What shall I do?"

Josh Tells His Side:

"My wife is making me into a cipher," said thirty-two-year-old Josh, a dark, handsome man conservatively dressed in a pin-striped suit. "Just last night she went over to a neighbor's house on the pretext of discussing a meeting of the P.T.A. I felt sure she and the neighbor—a woman I particularly dislike—had met to hash and rehash my failings as a husband.

"I waited an hour for Elsa to return, getting angrier by the minute. Then I locked the doors teach her a lesson. Sally happened to be ake. Both of my daughters take their ther's part in everything. Sally slipped out bed and unlocked the back door. I heard fooling with the latch and went to the hen just as Elsa stepped on the back porch. napped on the light. Sally screamed in r—fear of me, her father—and Elsa flew in- and took the child in her arms. She held ly close and gave me a contemptuous look. a's scorn either makes me mad or makes feel like crawling. Last night I felt like wling.

Elsa neither admires nor respects me. I've to the place where I need a little help and pathy at home. I don't receive it. All day g I work under tension trying to get an est day's work out of a bunch of stupid, ficient kids who couldn't care less about r jobs. Our bank doesn't seem to attract scientious, efficient girls. We get the drift- and the clock watchers. I bawl them out stantly, but it doesn't do one iota of good. y mock and laugh at me behind my back. y ignore my orders for the fun of seeing lose my temper.

My average working day runs from eight until half past four. Not long ago I had tay until eight P.M. tracking down a short- of $1.85 that resulted from the sloppy kkeeping of a girl named Marilyn. Next ning I confronted Marilyn with the error she sailed into the rest room to smoke a rette. The other kids laughed like zanies for the balance of the day they flouted authority in every conceivable way. Mar- is the ringleader; because she spends a lot her time varnishing her fingernails and bing her hair, the rest follow suit. The r day my immediate boss dropped in and department looked like a beauty parlor. I ld like to fire Marilyn, but if I discharged it would only convince my superiors that I 't control my own staff.

"When I come home in the evening after a day of battling subordinates and bucking traffic—it takes me an hour to cover eighteen miles—I'm dead beat. All I want is to change into slacks and play with Tommy or maybe relax a little over television before supper. What Elsa wants is to rush me through a list of chores she's been saving up all day—it seems to me she could dispose of the trash herself—and then rush me through my meal. Many an evening I'm so depressed by the prospect ahead that I stop on the way home and brace myself with a few drinks.

"I wish Elsa would try just once to see my side of things. It shouldn't be hard for her to understand I was obliged to attend our office party. My boss specifically ordered me to go and keep my staff in line. Elsa's telephone call to the country club made me look ridiculous. It lowered me in the estimation of my superiors and, in my opinion, jeopardized a raise I've been sweating out since September. As I was leaving the phone booth I ran smack into a bank vice president and he cocked an eyebrow and cracked, 'Domestic trouble? Wife wants you home, I suppose.' I told him no. Promotions seldom go to men tied to apron strings.

"The vice president stayed on at the party and I did too. I was so miserable and disgusted I drank twice as much as I had intended. I can barely recall the kids' ganging up and plastering me with lipsticky kisses, but I can distinctly recall Elsa's reaction later—the contempt in her eyes, the flat, unloving note in her voice. I'm sorry I hit her, as I've told her repeatedly, but I just couldn't help myself.

"I'll admit I didn't distinguish myself at the office party, but Elsa has been paying me off for weeks. She doesn't say much, but she keeps on the pressure. She lets me know in dozens of oblique, left-handed ways that she is clinging to her grudge. On Christmas afternoon she maneuvered me into visiting my mother, although my mother and I have no fondness for each other. The visit was meant to punish me.

"All things considered, I don't think I've done so badly in life. I climbed from the bottom with nobody's help. When my mother was sixteen her parents, ignorant people, married her to an old man of sixty on the mistaken theory he had money. My mother had to go to work to support him and us five children. In those days I was terribly ashamed of my dad; the other youngsters in the neighborhood called him grandpop and I did too. I'm sorry now. He died when I was ten and my kid brother nine. We then found out how he had shielded us from my mother. She had a fiery temper and a great fear we children would wind up as juvenile delinquents. Many a night my kid brother and I would wake up in bed to find her beating us for practically no reason. One time he and I ran out of the house in our underclothes with her after us and climbed up in the rafters of a big barn. She poked us out with a broomstick and then whaled away at us until the broomstick broke.

"I was a big kid for my age and at twelve I got my first paying job—singing birthday messages for the telegraph company. About the same time, I was put in charge of our school bank and was allowed to deposit the funds in the real bank. My mother was excited by the honor, but she had no real understanding of what it meant to me. When I told her I intended to be a banker when I grew up, she laughed scornfully. In our circumstances my ambition seemed as distant as the moon.

"I can still remember the store where we traded when I was little. My mother would send my brother and me to buy the cheapest foods, and we always had to cool our heels until the store was empty before we were waited on. One day I noticed a number of spoiled bananas in a garbage barrel in the back alley. I asked a clerk—he was a smart-alecky young fellow—if my brother and I could have them. He said I could take a spoiled banana for every red pepper I would chew and swallow without a drink of water. I can still see the clerk laughing as I hopped from one foot to the other, tears streaming from my eyes. I finally quit with six overripe bananas for my kid brother and myself.

"It never occurred to me to break the bargain and swipe the bananas from the alley when nobody was looking. Honesty is a cardinal rule with me to this day. Another rule is paying my bills on the dot and staying out of debt. Elsa thinks I should use my GI rights to buy a house. To me a mortgage is debt and I would rather camp out than assume an obligation I can't liquidate promptly.

"When Elsa attacks my principles, I can defend myself. But I am cut to the quick by the way she belittles my job. Three months ago at a big general meeting of all the bank officials I was named an assistant cashier as a reward for devising a more effective method of keeping our records. The president of the bank congratulated me personally and then made a speech outlining policy for the coming year. That evening I tried to describe the meeting to Elsa. A glazed look came in her eyes. When I finished talking she first asked who had sat next to me at the meeting, whether it was a man or a woman. Then she asked why my promotion to assistant cashier didn't carry an automatic raise. She never did congratulate me on my new title. She takes no pride in it.

"It is true many men of my age make more money than I do; a bank job is no quick way to big pay. But I am doing what I want to do and what I am qualified to do. Preferment is slow, but, if she'll help, I think I can go places. So far she hasn't helped me—she has handicapped me. She has never been cordial to any of my associates, even when she pops unexpectedly into the bank. A few months ago I introduced her to my boss and at once she began hinting around I should have a raise. In business or in banking, this is neither good practice nor practical. It didn't boost my stock.

"I started in a small-town bank in Oregon. I was doing well and I was getting promotions. We left because Elsa was jealous of a woman who worked beside me. I negotiated to get the job here, resigned, and, of course, lost my seniority. Frankly, I was a fool throughout. The woman in question, Irene, was very little interested in me and I was very little interested in her. Irene's main object was to make her husband jealous. My object was to alarm Elsa into paying a little attention to me. I was hungry for attention and warmth.

"When I was courting Elsa I thought we were ideally matched. I fell in love with her almost at first sight. I was just out of the Army and going to college in Oregon on the G.I. bill; I was studying economics and banking. I heard a lot about Elsa from mutual friends and, even before we met, admired her energy and courage; I knew she was carrying both a job and college courses. Then one evening we were both invited to dinner at the last minute. Elsa had just washed her hair. Most girls would have excused themselves. Not Elsa. She wound a scarf around her wet hair and walked into the restaurant beside me with her head held regally high. I knew I loved her then.

"Our six-month courtship only made me love her more. We used to eat by candlelight in her apartment. Nobody had ever asked me what foods I preferred to eat. Elsa did. I shopped and she prepared the dishes. She was a dandy cook and an excellent housekeeper.

She was thrifty and clever in the handling of money, and she still is. But somewhere after marriage a change set in. I can't tell you exactly when. Probably it was after Sally was born and money got hard.

"Anyway, happiness was a long time ago. If Elsa wasn't sniping away at me because of the office Christmas party, she'd be at me for something else. At times she gets a certain look on her face and a contemptuous note in her voice, and I go plain haywire. My temper boils over and I literally don't know what I'm doing. Afterward I am ashamed—which I suppose is no help. I realize I should have more self-control, but the truth is I haven't much incentive to mend my ways.

"Tommy is the only member of my family who is in the least impressed by me. When I leave the house in the morning Elsa doesn't kiss me and say good-by—she is usually still in bed—and on my return in the evening I can be sure she and the girls won't smile at me and say hello. When I come through the door Tommy is the one who smiles.

"Our marriage is unsatisfactory to me and I guess it is unsatisfactory to Elsa too. However, I believe we should stay together for the children's sake. To do so—I am sure—we will have to stop our incessant quarreling."

The Marriage Counselor Says:

"I am no enthusiast for office parties that exclude husbands and wives. I have seen too many of these celebrations mar the joy of the Christmas holidays for families. A good many times the participants themselves, like Josh, enjoy neither the party nor the aftermath. Particularly the aftermath.

"Speaking for myself, I question the propriety of a business firm's sponsoring a social event where youthful employees are served alcoholic beverages and permitted to make fools of themselves. However, the office party wasn't the real problem in this case. Both Elsa and Josh acknowledged that their difficulties began long before. But they didn't understand the reasons for their unhappiness.

"Elsa and Josh were unusually likable young people and I very much wanted to help them. They wanted help and needed help. Well educated and intelligent, both were immature emotionally. Groundless jealousy—even jealousy itself—is always a sign of immaturity and personal insecurity. Elsa was jealous of Marilyn, a girl Josh actively disliked. Josh was jealous of Elsa's friendly interest in their neighbors; he childishly revenged himself by locking her out of the house.

"I had a big advantage in assisting them to a satisfying marriage. Elsa and Josh accepted me at once—just as though I were the father they both had missed so sorely during their formative years. Since they regarded me as what we psychologists call an 'authority figure,' I was able to spell out my advice in specific terms. In our interviews we went back to their courtship. At that time Elsa had decided her background and Josh's were similar. It is true they had poverty in common. But she hadn't taken into account a striking difference in their environments and temperaments.

"Josh's ancestors came from Southern Europe. He grew up in a family climate that was exciting, dramatic, emotionally supercharged. Even now he has a sharp need for outward expression of feelings. Elsa's people were Scandinavian, reserved and undemonstrative. As she was shunted from household to household in her childhood, Elsa learned to curb any show of emotion. Trouble between her and Josh began almost with the honeymoon. Josh wanted warmth, attention, appreciation. When he felt he received too little from his reticent, inhibited bride, he reacted with outbursts of rage worthy of his violent-tempered mother. These outbursts, often occurring in public, humiliated Elsa and drove her even further into herself. Josh's undisciplined behavior, as Elsa saw it, robbed her of what she most wanted from marriage—a stable home and a solid position in the community.

"Elsa was jolted and shocked when I told her she was partly at fault. If she wanted a serene family life, she would have to learn to give Josh what he wanted from their marriage and thereby help him control his temper. Could she be more outgoing, more appreciative, more demonstrative in love? Elsa didn't think so. She was so emotionally inarticulate, she said, that even when she had 'warm words in her mind for Josh, the warm words stuck in her throat.'

"I told her about a marriage problem I had failed to resolve as a counselor. This was the case of an inarticulate husband who couldn't bring himself to say 'Thank you' to his wife for anything she did. He was generous with money, he was generous with cars and charge accounts, but he was stingy with courtesy and praise. And he was so stubborn that he preferred divorce to surrender. Stubborn Elsa caught on. She changed her tack and forced herself in many small ways to demonstrate to Josh her inward affection and good will.

"Instead of lying abed in the morning, she got up and prepared his breakfast and kissed him warmly before he went to work. She welcomed him with a smile and a kiss on his evening return. She taught her small daughters to do the same. Josh's response—it was an easy change for the little girls, difficult for Elsa—was immediate. He found virtues in his daughters as well as in his baby son. Josh had been jealous of Sally and Jane and their partiality for Elsa, which I suspect she may have encouraged. The little girls were delighted to be affectionate to Josh when he showed affection for them.

"Elsa cut down on the dull array of evening chores she used to have lined up and awaiting Josh at the very moment he stepped in his door. She set the dinner hour thirty minutes later so he would have a chance to relax. Josh was deeply appreciative of her thoughtfulness. It meant a lot to him. Previously Elsa had made him feel like an insignificant handy man not the breadwinner and head of a family. Nowadays if Elsa happens to forget her new resolutions and does break into his period of relaxation with some tedious request, he usually is able to keep his temper in hand instead of flaring up at once. To Elsa's pleased amazement, he often volunteers to take out the trash and so on.

"Whereas Elsa learned to stop and think and express her feelings on every possible occasion, Josh learned to stop and think and repress some of his feelings. He has studied and familiarized himself with Elsa's reactions. He now knows if he succumbs to sudden rage and roars at her, the result may be that she will remain glumly silent for the balance of the evening. He realizes his anger has a price and he seldom cares to pay the price.

"Josh had virtually no insight into his relationship with others. If everybody in his department at the bank was behaving badly, as he reported, it seemed fairly clear that his personality and his methods as an executive must be to blame. The truth was that Josh expected too much of his staff. As a boy, he had struggled fiercely to satisfy a mother who expected too much of him and had always felt he was failing. Instinctively he expected and demanded that his giddy young subordinates struggle just as hard.

"Although Josh was abnormally sensitive it didn't occur to him that the youngsters working under his direction also had feelings, self-esteem, vanity. I suggested he put himself into his subordinates' place, praise them when they deserved praise, and refrain from bawling them out for minor infractions. After he grasped the fact that his attitude as an executive was a reflection of his frustrating childhood, Josh followed this quite obvious advice. To his surprise, the morale of his staff quickly improved, and office efficiency too. Taking his courage in hand, he then discharged Marilyn, a clock watcher to the end, and was gratified to discover that neither his staff nor his superiors protested his decision.

"Elsa deserved a new shake in the matter of the family budget. It was all very well for Josh to have principles against debt, but in the case of his family a modest amount of installment buying was sensible. He and Elsa bought an automatic washing machine, something she long had yearned for. They made the down payment by saving all their two-dollar bills for seven months. At present the money market is so tight they have postponed buying a house but Josh has agreed to obtain a G.I. loan as soon as feasible. Elsa has high hopes they will own a home in the not too distant future. Right now she has the pleasure of driving around every Sunday with Josh and the children to explore current housing developments and to plan the kind of house she wants.

"Elsa and Josh's recreation picture is now entirely different. Elsa was cooped up far too much. Now that Josh has less strain to cope with during his business day, he comes home less exhausted and he comes home earlier. The tavern stops are a thing of the past. He and Elsa occasionally entertain their neighbors at a simple cook-out in their back yard and Josh has learned to enjoy the company of people he previously thought of bitterly as Elsa's allies and his enemies. Elsa and Josh regularly trade off baby-sitting with their neighbors, and once a week they go square dancing.

"If Elsa hadn't been so housebound and deprived of the normal pleasures of the young I doubt if she would have been so outraged by Josh's office party. Last September I had a note informing me that Josh had finally received his long-awaited raise. When I telephoned to congratulate him I heard that plans for this year's office party were already in progress. Josh intends to go to the party, once again by himself. Elsa is resigned if not enthusiastic. Both she and Josh now feel too secure in themselves, too sure in their mutual love and understanding, to anticipate a renewed quarrel. Indeed, both of them declared to me their belief that this Christmas of 1957 will be the happiest they have ever shared."

That "harrumph" that annoys you so isn't in itself dire. Coughing is a red light, signalling trouble on the respiratory line and also helps the body's airways to expel germs, phlegm, coal dust—anything you happen to breathe in. Thanks to that protective cough the air passages can expel irritating matter and bacteria.

Your bark is triggered by irritation of nerve endings in the air passages. If you swallow something the wrong way, inhale smog, or phlegm collects, those nerve cells flash "Go," the larynx closes up, diaphragm muscles put the air in the lungs under pressure—and you cough!

When you're down with flu or pneumonia or just a cold, you don't appreciate it but your hacking helps protect your lungs. That's why it often hangs on after you think you're OK.

But you can have too much of a good thing! A pointless, nervous, dry cough can actually be quite harmful; the sooner you get rid of it the better. That's why we use so many NEO-AQUA-DRIN Throat Lozenges in our family. Their pain-soothing ingredient quiets throat irritation and roughness, and the antibiotic content fights germs. NEO-AQUA-DRIN helps prevent trouble from digging into the throat.

This holiday time everyone is on high—children teetering with anticipation of Christmas, all of us giving and going to parties with a sublime seasonal disregard of proper nutrition as well as calories! But if we're to enjoy holidays we need to feel good. That's why I'm doubly careful to see that everyone in the house gets their BEXEL Vitamins. BEXEL offers special vitamins for every age, from Gramp to the baby. With BEXEL help, we can all have fun.

Dear old Uncle Joe will arrive in time to help trim the tree. We know he's just acquired new dentures but doesn't like to say so. Well, of all times one wants to enjoy eating . . . it's Christmas. So I've invested in ORA-FIX and ORA and put them on Uncle's bedside table. ORA-FIX will hold his new teeth in place so well he'll munch nuts and hard candy with complete comfort. ORA cleans them thoroughly within twenty minutes.

His vitality is incredible, though Uncle Joe is well over seventy. When my husband and I are collapsing with fatigue he's on the crest. His one real trouble is arthritis.

When it isn't paining him he blithely pretends it doesn't exist. So I know he'll have been toting armsful of gifts all over town and driven 250 miles from his home to ours with the window down and cold air blowing on his bad shoulder.

Not being the Superman he thinks he is, he's in for a rough time—unless I take steps. I get a supply of SURIN and state firmly: "Uncle, for rheumatics this is, as the kids put it, great. It's no cure for arthritis; there isn't any. But you go and smooth on SURIN and then apply hot moist towels for two minutes. SURIN brings relief at the point of pain. You'll be feeling happy as Santa Claus!"

HOW AMERICA LIVES

JUST PLAIN GOOD

At the Wyman Rileys', of Vallejo, California, everyone takes a turn in the kitchen.

By MARJORIE WESTERN RILEY

The epicurean high light of our year is the arrival between Christmas and New Year's of a Virginia ham from my husband's ex-commanding officer. Every year we plan a party for that ham—serve it festively decorated with little melt-in-your-mouth biscuits that Ellen makes and lots of relishes and a lovely light apple punch. The ham is always a big one. It serves our family and friends and then the family some more. Usually I try to cook so there aren't any leftovers. I find my family totally detached. They just don't want leftovers! But with the Virginia ham it's different. I put it into a spaghetti sauce. And they adore it. Such a simple, sensible way to use up the ham.

SPAGHETTI MICHAEL (with ham sauce): Dice 2 cups leftover ham (Virginia ham is wonderful for this recipe). Brown in a skillet with 2 minced onions and 1 minced green pepper. Add 1 bay leaf (crushed). Stir in three 6-ounce cans Italian tomato paste thinned with 3 cans water. Stir in about 1 cup grated American cheese (I like to use any scraps of cheese on hand)—just mix the cheese into the hot sauce and stir until cheese is melted. Season sauce with 1½ teaspoons salt and ½ teaspoon pepper. Serve over cooked, buttered spaghetti (makes enough for 2 pounds of spaghetti).

It makes a whopping pan, often leaves leftovers. But this is one leftover the children will eat. Spaghetti is their favorite food.

My husband has a favorite too. Clams. Or rather, clams and clamming.

With these clams we do two things. He makes a chowder, and I bake deviled clams. Being so close to the coast, we use fresh clams, but my clams and his chowder are also delicious made with canned clams.

DI PIETRO

My two best helpers: Ellen and Margaret. They're both good cooks.

MY CLAMS: To 2 cups finely minced fresh clams (or three 7½-ounce cans) add ½ cup minced onion, ⅓ cup each minced green pepper and finely chopped celery and 1⅓ cups dry French bread crumbs (slice and toast 1 loaf bread and then finely grate). Stir in 1 cup heavy cream, 2 beaten eggs, 2 tablespoons melted butter or margarine, 2 teaspoons prepared mustard, 1½ teaspoons salt and 1 teaspoon pepper. Scoop mixture back into the clam shells. Bake for 20 minutes in a moderate oven, 350° F. Remove and sprinkle heavily with grated Parmesan cheese. Place ½ strip bacon on top of each shell and heat until the bacon is crisp. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

Although my husband feels it is a sacrilege to suggest this, the mixture can be baked in pottery shells. The authentic shells give the dish true glamour. We have served the clams during the holiday season as appetizers.

STUART

For a special holiday treat we like spicy deviled clams.

HIS CHOWDER: For each person use 1 small onion and 1 medium potato, peeled and quartered. Dice 2 stalks celery and simmer all slowly in 2 cups water until the entire mixture is smooth and thick. The vegetables will boil down completely—but you'll have to watch the chowder closely, and stir it frequently to keep it from scorching on the bottom of the pan. Cut 10 strips bacon into small pieces (use scissors) and brown until crisp. Drain on paper toweling. Add bacon to the vegetables, stir well and simmer for 5 minutes. Add 2 cups finely minced clams and juice (either fresh or canned clams) and let cook for 10 minutes. Season to taste with salt and pepper. The chowder will be very thick. Thin with 1 cup water. Simmer a few minutes more and serve. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

Turkey, of course, is traditional—traditional with others, traditional with . But we don't have the traditionally Titanic Tom. We did for a while. But e were forever eating him up. Turkey leftovers we don't like. So we buy two naller turkeys, eat them up at one meal—and have twice as many drumicks for the children.

With the turkey we serve different salads—sometimes an old-fashioned fruit lad using what California fruits we have in season, sometimes we make a jellied anberry salad. It's spicy and good, especially with a mayonnaise-fruit dressing.

OLDED CRANBERRY SALAD: Drain 1 No. 2 can crushed pineapple. dd enough water to the pineapple syrup to make 1 cup liquid, then ften 3 envelopes lemon-flavored gelatin and 2 envelopes unflavored gelatin in e syrup. Cook 1½ pounds fresh cranberries in 3 cups water until skins pop. rain cranberries and add 3 cups hot cranberry juice to the gelatin mixre (if necessary, add boiling water to make 3 cups). Purée cranberries and r in 1½ cups sugar, 1 teaspoon cinnamon and ½ teaspoon nutmeg. Chop ough celery and walnuts to make 1½ cups each. Add the celery, walts, puréed cranberries, 1 cup crushed pineapple, 1 finely ground orange d the juice of 1 lemon to gelatin mixture. Pour into a 3-quart ring mold d chill until firm. Unmold on crisp lettuce and serve with a mayonnaiseit dressing. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

AYONNAISE-FRUIT DRESSING: Combine 1 cup mayonnaise, 2 teaoons grated orange rind, the juice of ½ orange, 3 tablespoons sugar, ¼ spoon nutmeg and ½ teaspoon cinnamon. Whip 1 cup heavy cream until F and fold into mayonnaise. Serve over molded cranberry salad.

Generally we aren't much on sweets. We can't be and feel good about it. You see, Timmy, our eight-year-old, has diabetes. So we plan things we can all eat. But the girls do bake a wonderful Dutch shortbread. The recipe wasn't ours originally. We have a friendly neighbor who almost never comes to call without something just out of the oven. She gave us the recipe for Boterkoek. Now the girls make it, and we eat it up—before it's scarcely cold.

BOTERKOEK (DUTCH SHORTBREAD): Cream together 1 cup powdered sugar and ½ pound butter until light. Stir in 2 teaspoons grated lemon rind, 1 teaspoon lemon juice and ½ teaspoon vanilla. Sift and measure 2 cups cake flour. Beat into the sugar-butter mixture and add ½ teaspoon salt. Bake in a square pan (9″x9″x2″) in a moderate oven, 350° F., until golden brown on top. Cut into squares while hot. Cool and serve.

These are the things we like. Plain food it is—but very plainly, we think pretty good.

DAUGHTER OF THE SULTAN

recognize his mother only by her shoes. In the modern part of the city pretty French girls in sun-back dresses rock and roll to the latest American rhythms.

On a central hill, in a jumbled white-plastered palace, half Oriental and half modern in style, lives the man who is trying to unify these two cultures: Sidi Mohammed Ben Youssef, descendant of the Prophet, eighteenth member of his dynasty to be a monarch, Sultan of Morocco (only recently has he decided to call himself King). Approximately a mile square and dotted with royal residential and administrative buildings, the palace compound is the real nerve center of Morocco—for the country, although now independent, is still an absolute monarchy. If the sultan wishes, he can chop off the head of a subject who happens to step on his toe. Luckily, he is a benevolent ruler.

The sultan was not always as powerful as he is today. The third son of Sultan Moulay Youssef, he was a shy and scholarly young man who expected, when his father died in 1927, that one of his elder brothers would be chosen for the throne by the all-powerful French. But France ignored the elder brothers and saw to it that the young man they thought would make a good puppet ruler was chosen as sultan. There was, after all, nothing much for him to do—he could busy himself with his sixty inherited palaces, his 10,000 retainers, his vast wealth, his books, his racing cars, horses and pretty women.

Underestimating the sultan's searching curiosity about the world outside Morocco, the French permitted him to tour Europe a year after his enthronement; he returned with a conviction that his country must adopt those progressive Western customs which did not actually conflict with the basic beliefs of Islam.

He began with his first child. The sultan's wife, a woman of the upper classes from the Berber (or indigenous, pre-Arab) population, was barely sixteen when Prince Moulay Hassan was born in 1929; the sultan was nineteen. Before the birth he went to Paris and brought back home with him diapers, a crib, nursing bottles, baby scales and a French midwife. "I want my child's umbilical cord cut in the twentieth-century manner," he explained. It was.

A year later Princess Aisha was born. She was followed in 1933 by Princess Malika, in 1936 by Prince Abdullah, and in 1939 by Princess Nzah—all children of the same mother.

As is customary in many royal families, and particularly in Islamic countries where a father has "modern" ideas, the children were separated from their mother soon after birth, and given into the care of professional nurses and, later, governesses. The sultana visited them daily, but had no voice in the rigid system of child care in which they were reared—adopted by the sultan from the ideas which then prevailed in Europe and America. On schedule they ate, slept, exercised, were weighed, inoculated, disciplined.

"We each had a Moroccan nurse and a French nurse," Princess Aisha recalls. "We learned the two ways of life at the same time: French and Arabic; European manners, Moroccan customs. Never were we really French, but neither have we ever lived exclusively in the Moroccan fashion. We like to think that we have been able to choose and adapt the best of two ways of life."

Remembering these early days in the nursery, and the efficient French nurses, Princess Aisha shivered a little.

"Oh, they were strict!" she exclaimed. "But, of course, they had to be," she added hastily.

The nursery wing of the huge, jumbled palace was, at first, their world. At night the French nurse slept in an enormous brass bed, surrounded by the high French cribs of the children, each crib draped in festoons of white mosquito netting. In the daytime there was a fairyland of toys to amuse them, ordered from Europe and America by their doting father: Teddy bears and blocks, jolly rocking horses and tinkling music boxes, Paris dolls with satin dresses and staring blue china eyes.

And every day their father managed to spend several hours with his children, watching over their meals and their playtime, encouraging them to climb on his lap, his arms and his shoulders as he sat in his big gilt armchair in the nursery courtyard. Outside these secluded rooms and gardens he was "Your Majesty"; here he was "papa."

"It was our father who gave us most of our sense of security and love," Lalla Aisha once explained. "It was he who kissed the bumps when we tumbled and hurt ourselves, and made us feel happy again. Isn't it natural that it is the father who does this?"

As the children grew older there were more presents: cameras and radios and phonographs, and beautifully colored books of French fairy tales, where the young children gazed as in a mirror at pictures of other princes and princesses. And in their own looking glasses their reflections were often as magical: for family parties and gatherings of the sultan's clan, Aisha wore a jeweled headband and a long Moroccan robe of green velvet, embroidered and belted with gold; Hassan wore a white muslin gown, a little cap twinkling with jewels, and slippers with turned-up toes. And in their closets were rows and rows of smart clothes from Paris—long pants and brass-buttoned jackets for Hassan, rose-sprigged frocks with matching bloomers for Aisha.

And always, everywhere, there were servants. Nurses who called them "Your Highness" no matter what the naughtiness or the spanking to come. The palace guard, tall Moroccan Negroes majestic in red-and-white uniforms, gravely returning the salutes of the self-important young royalties. Barefooted serving girls from the far-off mountains, bowing to the children with reverence and perhaps the hint of an indulgent smile. And slipping through the palace on pointed yellow slippers, the sultan's petty palace officials, elfin in their pointed red caps, their soft white gowns. If spoiling took place, it was, perhaps, inevitable.

Their world expanded, and they began to explore. There were huge rooms in the palace, paneled in dark wood and hung with glittering chandeliers. There were deep sofas covered with red cut velvet. There were floors of mosaic, blue and green and yellow, glowing with intricate patterns. There were plaster walls and arches carved in marvelously delicate designs. The palace grounds were wonderland, for they contained a zoo stocked with species of animals which had once been native to Morocco: elephants, lions, panthers, monkeys, ostriches. The children's pet was a baby gazelle, brought up from the Moroccan part of the Sahara Desert, which would eat from their hands. Until recently, when the gazelle died, the princes and princesses continued to visit their childhood pet.

In the stables of the palace compound were sleek and gleaming Arabian race horses with flowing manes and tails, and the children's own little fat ponies, tiny but spirited. In a nearby garage—once an old coach house—stood the sultan's collection of European sports cars, his gold-embellished procession carriage, and a gay red pony cart for the children.

Unlike her new little sister, Amina, daughter of the sultan's second wife, Princess Aisha did not often appear in public during her early childhood. Fridays were an exception—the day of special prayer for Moslems, as Sunday is for Christians.

Mohammed V, who is believed by Moslems to be a direct descendant of the Prophet, is not only the temporal but also the spiritual leader of his people. In this capacity every Friday noontime when he is in Rabat he mounts a great gray stallion at the doors of his palace and, under the protection of a red-and-gold umbrella held by a runner, rides across a quarter mile of dusty palace compound to worship within the walls of his pure white mosque—his procession watched and acclaimed by thousands of his subjects. "Yoo-yoo-yoo!" the veiled women wail in the warbling cry of admiration for which they are famous—and their pink or yellow chiffon veils flutter with the force of their cries of joy.

And every Friday morning when she was little, Lalla Aisha would be dressed by her nurses in a short white frock, a white sunbonnet and little white gloves, and sitting beside her brother (dressed in a white Moroccan gown touching his ankles) would ride in the red pony cart behind her father's stallion, would wait until he had completed his worship, would look curiously at the staring, cheering crowds and return in a cloud of dust to the peacefulness behind the palace walls. These were her first, and formative, experiences of appearing in public.

They were a happy family of children, with the little Aisha trailing after her elder brother like a shadow, the younger children following in their wake. But sometimes, as they grew older, there were quarrels.

"Hassan was always good at sports, and I always wanted to beat him," the princess remembers. "Once, when I was about nine years old, we were playing tennis and he was winning every point. I became so angry that I threw my racket at him—and he didn't duck! He still has the scar of three stitches on his nose, and I still feel guilty every time I notice it."

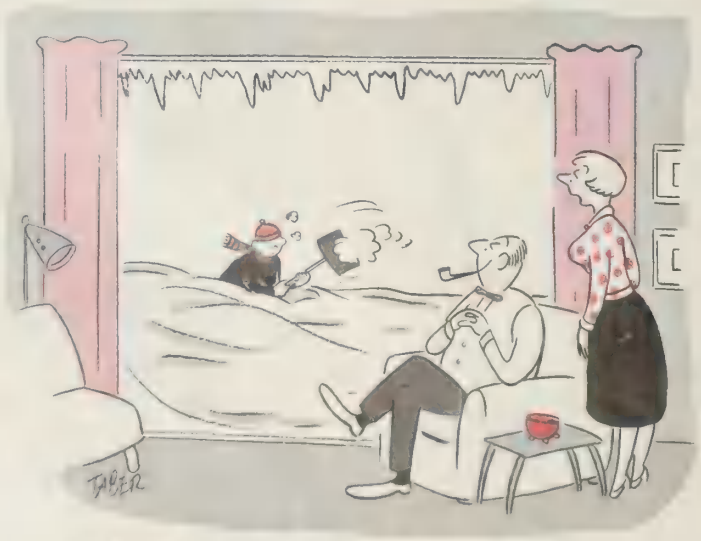
Such occasions were few, but they always resulted in a lecture from the Moroccan governess: "Your Highness is named Aisha, and that is a very important name, although a common one. The Prophet's favorite wife was named Aisha, and she was a very wise woman, worldly and spiritual at the same time. When needed, she could help to lead her people, but she was also a good and obedient wife. That is because she never, never lost her temper!"

About this time, when Aisha was nine years old, the sultan decided to follow royal tradition and establish each child in his own separate household. A villa near the palace was chosen for ten-year-old Moulay Hassan and another for three-year-old Abdullah, each villa staffed with housekeeper, governesses and servants. Aisha and Malika, because the two sisters were so close in age, were allowed to stay together in their own household within the palace compound. The little Princess Nzah, who was then an infant, remained in the old nursery. The separation, however, was only one of living arrangements; at school and at play the children remained together.

In the schoolhouse, a small stucco building within the palace compound, the children studied the same subjects: reading, writing and arithmetic—in French—and later on, history, literature, geometry, algebra, science. Side by side went studies in Arabic language and history and study of the Koran, the Bible of the Moslems. The teachers ranged from a nun to a cavalry officer to the wife of a French civil servant—a Mrs. Hugen, who directed the school for eight years, and whom the princess remembers as a general favorite of all the children.

Newspapers and magazines of the time described the sultan as a man much given to pleasure. They report that the toys he heaped on his children were nothing to the racing cars, rare guns and expensive sports (including concubines) with which he indulged himself. But everyone who knew the royal family in those early days remembers first that he was a remarkably good father to his children.

"We could always talk to him about anything," Princess Aisha recalls. "He expected us to do our best, to excel in whatever we did. But he gave us every opportunity to learn how to do our best. We knew he loved us very much. Even when he gave us something very hard to do, or asked more of us than we thought we ever wanted to or ever could give, we knew, the way children do know, that he was right. We realized from the beginning that he wouldn't have asked us if he hadn't loved us so much."



Almost daily the sultan visited the schoolhouse, standing sometimes silent in the back of the room while one of the children recited or asking test questions himself. Nor did he neglect their athletic development. When Hassan and Aisha were about six and five, the father installed a tiled swimming pool and a small gymnasium in the basement of the palace. There, every day, an instructor gave the three oldest children lessons in swimming and led them through strenuous calisthenics. Horseback riding and tennis lessons were also started very early; so was skiing instruction during the winter, when the whole family went on vacation to the Swiss-style town of Ifrane up in the Atlas Mountains.

"I still love to swim and to ride, to play tennis and to ski," says Princess Aisha. "Yet I remember how strict our instructors were and that father was even stricter. Still, we learned to love these sports and to do them well, so they must have been right in the way they trained us."

Only vaguely did Aisha realize how unconventional this training was, or comprehend that she and her sister were the first generation of Arab women to be trained in sports, to be allowed to continue them after they had reached the age of puberty, the time for putting on the veil.

But: "I promise you that you will never have to wear a veil," her father told the young girl. Not until later did she realize the full import of his decision. Her life within the palace walls had been so free that she still had no real comprehension of the iron-banded restrictions which surrounded the other women of Morocco.

Hassan was seventeen, about to enter the college which his father had built for him and other aristocratic boys near the palace compound. Aisha was sixteen, just finished with her studies in the little palace schoolhouse. One day her father summoned her, and handed her a sheaf of papers.

"This is a speech called The Emancipation of Women," he told her solemnly. "I want you to go to Tangier and read it at a public meeting of women. I want you to appear unveiled." So Aisha, speech in hand, went to Tangier and stepped out on the platform. There was a gasp from the audience: she was the first Moroccan woman ever to appear without a veil on a public platform.

"I had no stage fright, and I was completely unconscious of the effect of my appearance or of what I was saying," she recalls. "I was just doing what my father had told me to do, and I didn't understand that there was anything very extraordinary about it."

She soon learned that there was. Overnight the royal teen-ager became a national heroine to the women of Morocco. Letters poured into the palace blessing her, begging her to go on with her "crusade." More and more Moroccan women, particularly those of the upper classes, began leaving off the face veil. When Aisha and Malika went shopping alone in downtown Rabat, which they were now allowed to do, there was a new expression in the stares which followed the princesses.

But the young heroine was still a schoolgirl, now a pupil at the French lycée, a vine-covered building in the European section of Rabat, where the princess attended all-girl classes. Most of her schoolmates, daughters of French government officials or Moroccan aristocrats, remember her at this time as "very intelligent," "simple and direct" and "shy." Her friends today still use the same adjectives in describing her.

The years passed, her routine of high-school and junior-college studies punctuated by skiing trips to the mountains, by more unveiled speeches and by much, much political talk.

The sultan—some say with the urging of President Roosevelt—had abandoned his unwelcome role as puppet and begun to take an active role in the liberation movement which was then sweeping Morocco. Most Moroccans wanted freedom, wanted the French to relinquish political control, and the sultan agreed with them. But his position was delicate: El Glaoui, the powerful Pasha of Marrakesh, had cast his lot with the French and rallied to his side all the conservative, traditional elements who feared that liberation might endanger their feudal privileges.

Lalla Aisha, just finishing at the lycée in her early twenties, found her relations with her French schoolmates strained to the point of tension. Much worse was the news that a photograph she had thoughtlessly posed for in a one-piece bathing suit was making a sensation in all the bazaars of Morocco. Hundreds of copies were circulated by the Glaoui's men (and some say by the French) in an effort to discredit the sultan by proving the immorality of his daughter. To an ordinary Moslem, any woman who allows her picture to be taken in a bathing suit is quite clearly a bad woman.

Aisha, when she heard these rumors, was angry. Malika was calm but worried, and young Nzah was merely wide-eyed. But all three agreed that they wanted at last to put on veils, to hide from the stares and the criticism. One day, sitting with their father on the white wrought-iron benches in the palace garden, the dragonflies darting above a nearby reflecting pool, they told him of this wish, and of their anger at the men who criticized them as loose women.

"Hypocrites!" Aisha exploded.

"Not at all," their father replied, as Aisha remembers. "They are sincere. But none of them can prove that I should put you in veils, and keep your heads empty. I've tried to warn you that you would be criticized for wearing European clothes. You'd be criticized by others if you didn't. You are princesses, and that is what you must expect." He looked at them from the corner of his eye. "Did you know that the French women criticize you for not being chic enough? They think you should wear hats and gloves and long stockings every time you appear in public, like European princesses."

The girls looked at one another, startled.

"But never mind," the sultan continued. "You're in Morocco where it is often hot, and it is foolish to dress for the climate of Paris. I haven't trained you to be sportswomen, or fashion models, or religious leaders. I've trained you to be princesses. Leaders don't hide behind a veil or anything else. And once they're convinced something is right, they go ahead with it to the end. Do you understand?"

They nodded their heads. "Yes, father."

"But ——" The sultan paused. "Aisha."

"Yes, sir."

"Don't be posing in swimming suits any more. It is enough that they know that you swim."

Only once, after that, did the Princess Aisha put on a veil—not in fright, but for fun. The sultan was to appear one evening in the old streets and squares as the high point in the celebration of "The Feast of the Throne"—Morocco's gayest festival, commemorating the day when the sultan acceded to the kingdom. Aisha thought it would be exciting to see a ceremony to which she had not been invited, this time as an ordinary Moroccan. Whether or not Aisha first suggested the idea no one will say (the whole escapade is considered amusing, but embarrassing). At any rate, the princess and a group of her friends dressed up in the Moroccan woman's customary all-concealing gown and the little chiffon triangle of veil, and went off to the old section of the city, on foot, to see the sultan from the viewpoint of the ordinary respectable woman-in-the-street.

"The veils kept slipping off our noses," one of the girls recalls. "We didn't know how to tie them on properly at the back of our heads. And of course we walked more like French women than Moroccan women. You have to take shorter steps when you wear a robe down to your ankles. But still, no one recognized us. I think the princess had more fun that night, mingling with a crowd without being stared at, than she has ever had before or since."

But there was not much more fun in store, for the political clouds had gathered into a hurricane. Her father was more and more identified with the Istiqlal, the freedom-seeking independence party which by this time had been outlawed by the French. Her brother Moulay Hassan had graduated from his college with a Bordeaux-granted degree in law, and had thrown himself ardently into the fight for Moroccan independence. Her own speeches on behalf of the emancipation of Moroccan women were interpreted by the French as subversive and she was ordered to stop them Now the entire family was suspect.

Everyone was tense. One August evening ir the summer of 1953, Aisha sat at dinner with her father and the rest of her family. One more member had been added: a fair-skinned young Berber woman whom the sultan had recently taken as his second wife, and who was already pregnant. Koranic law permits a man to have four wives simultaneously, provided he treats each one equally; so familiar were the women of the family with this idea that there was little resentment of the newcomer or of the child she would bear. The two wives sometimes made formal calls together (heavily veiled, of course) on the wife of the French Resident.

Now the family toyed with their dinner at the great mahogany table under the chandeliers, and talked of the political crisis which had brought the country almost to the point of armed revolt. A servant entered, whispered in the sultan's ear. He excused himself and went away. An hour passed, and he did not return. Dinner finished, the family went into one of the palace's many living rooms, heavy with ornately carved dark wood and deep-piled rugs. Someone turned on the radio to hear the hourly news.

"Sultan Mohammed V," his family heard, "has been exiled from his throne by the French, and is already en route by airplane to Corsica."

French soldiers surrounded the palace. Young Abdullah, who had been out in one of his sports cars, had trouble trying to get back home and was almost arrested. Heavy with apprehension, the family waited for their unknown future.

On the third day they were told to pack the barest necessities. There was no time to make provisions for the care of the treasures in the palace—when they returned two years later they found that most of the palace had been looted.

Within a few hours the five royal children, their mother, the sultan's second wife and a small retinue of waiting women and servants were in a plane headed for exile. "Aisha was even more affected than any of the others by that experience," says a friend. "She has never really recovered from the shock."

For anyone the life on Napoleon's rough little Mediterranean island would have been difficult. For a family which had never known anything but soft beds, delicate foods and the silken surroundings of royalty, it was nightmare. For many days suitcases did not arrive—they were evidently being examined by the French—and the women were without even a comb. Shuddering, they used forks.

They were confined to an old police station, which had been converted to a "hotel" for the family. But the hotel would scarcely have won four stars from Michelin. The beds were two-inch straw pallets on concrete floors. The roof leaked, the food was coarse. Old cardboard cartons and orange crates served as furniture. They were finally permitted to have a tiny radio, and they learned to their outrage that an ancient, semi-illiterate uncle of the sultan's had been installed in Morocco by the French as the new sultan.

"The sultan and his family were treated one hundred times worse by the French than Napoleon was ever treated by the English!" the devoted friend recently exclaimed.

Mohammed V protested, officially, vigorously and often. After four months they were transferred to Madagascar, the large French island off the east coast of Africa. Here they lived in a rather crowded villa, where although there was little furniture at least the roof didn't leak. The tropical climate and the scarlet flame trees seemed unfamiliar, after the cool sea winds of Morocco—but at least the children could swim and play tennis. There were no schools available to them, so Hassan held daily classes for his younger brother and sisters in the subjects which he had already mastered. There was no other schooling.

Memories of this period are few, for it is a time which none of them likes to recall—except for the birth of little Amina, the sultan's youngest daughter. To all her family, as well as to Moroccan patriots, she became a symbol of faith, of rebirth as well as of birth. Today, at three, she is still a potent symbol as well as an enchanting child.

Two years passed. Women in Morocco wore black veils, to show that they were in mourning for their exiled sultan. Agitation for his return erupted daily. The mosques were empty, a sign that the people of Morocco had no faith in the spiritual leadership of the imposed sultan. Around the world there were pressures for self-determination, for independence. The French at last were forced to bow to modern history: the exiled sultan was summoned to Paris to discuss his reinstatement and the future independence of Morocco. He brought his family with him.

Negotiations for the independence of Morocco and the reinstatement of the sultan were concluded. One bright blue day in August, in 1955, the sultan flew to Rabat, preceded by a few minutes by his children, in another plane.

"We flew four times over Rabat, just five hundred feet above the houses," Aisha remembers. "We could see the crowd. We all cried with joy."

At the airfield a delegation of veiled women, all leaders of the independence movement, awaited her. As she stepped down from the plane all these women, with one gesture, reached up and ripped off their veils.

"Long live Aisha!" they shouted. "Long live the emancipation of women! Long live the independence of Morocco!"

Independence had come quickly, but the final emancipation of Moroccan women was still a long way off. There were more unveiled women on the streets than Aisha remembered from the time before the exile, and a number of women's organizations had been formed. Nevertheless, it was thought better for the royal princesses to remain in virtual seclusion until the political strength of the traditional elements in Morocco society could be determined. For several months Aisha was not seen in public.

Perhaps as compensation, she was allowed to visit the United States in the winter of 1956–57 with her brother Moulay Hassan, who was to take part in ceremonies admitting Morocco into the United Nations.

It was not, on the whole, a particularly successful trip. The time in New York and Washington was consumed by official receptions, tours, banquets—and Aisha, speaking no English and accustomed to a more informal life, was bored.

From a Western point of view, Aisha's training in public manners and behavior has been spotty. European and British princesses are carefully taught how to smile, how to wave to crowds, how to sit correctly on a public platform, how to make polite small conversation, how to conceal boredom.

The Perfect Gift for This Moment in This World —AND THE AMAZING STORY BEHIND IT

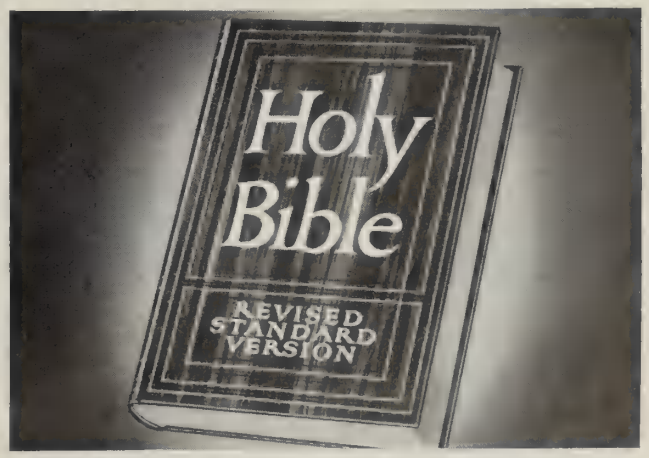
This Christmas you can give those you love a Bible they'll turn to twice as often because it is written in the language we use today. It is the great Revised Standard Version.

Most important Bible news in 346 years. In the 346 years since the King James Version, new discoveries of ancient manuscripts have shed added light on the Scriptures (in a long-forgotten cave near the Dead Sea, for example, Bedouin shepherds recently chanced on an Isaiah Scroll—a nearly complete text dating from about the time of Christ!). Manuscripts such as this have enabled scholars to find more than 6,000 errors in the New Testament alone.



Why it is easier to understand. Hundreds of words in the Bible have changed in meaning through the ages. (Did you know, for example, that a man's "conversation" once meant his conduct; that "by and by" meant immediately?) In the RSVB outmoded expressions are rephrased into the easy-to-understand language of today. A test of some 1,350 people showed that the average reader understood the RSVB better and responded to it more readily.

NEW YORK GRAPHIC SOCIETY

It can bring you closer to God. Here is a hallowed passage from Luke 18. See how easy the RSVB is to understand: "Now they were bringing even infants to him that he might touch them; and when the disciples saw it, they rebuked them. But Jesus called them to him, saying 'Let the children come to me and do not hinder them; for to such belongs the kingdom of God. Truly I say to you, whoever does not receive the kingdom of God like a child shall not enter it.'". . . How easy to understand . . . how beautiful!

A Bible for the family that already has a Bible. This Bible, praised by religious leaders of more than 40 major denominations, is the perfect Christmas gift. It solves many of your gift problems in a few minutes, and you'll be long remembered for such a treasured present . . . Illustrated edition (recommended for children) $3.50. Aisha, daughter of an absolute monarch, royal product of a different civilization, knows little of these arts. In private she is gay, informal, spirited. In public, particularly where there are men, she stands in the background, her eyes downcast, looking almost sullen. She is inclined to slouch in her chair on a public platform, and cross her knees. At one reception in her honor in Washington she remarked audibly to another Moroccan woman, "Let's get out of this terrible party and go somewhere fun!" The fact that she invariably is late to appointments—if she arrives at all—created a certain amount of resentment on the part of her American hosts.

But there were a few bright moments. At the airport she had been welcomed by, among others, a New York taxi driver of Moroccan descent. He invited her to his little apartment and Aisha insisted on going, saying that she wished to see how ordinary people lived in America. The taxi driver and his wife entertained the princess in their kitchen, serving her with lovingly prepared Moroccan-style roast lamb, couscous (a national dish of seminola), sweet mint tea and little Arab cakes. She says now it was one of the few real experiences she had in the United States.

Hassan discovered shrimp cocktails, and Aisha discovered hamburgers; these foods became and have remained a passion. They heard Harry Belafonte sing, and fell in love with Latin American rhythms. They felt at home in California, for it looks much like Morocco, and enjoyed swimming in the Pacific surf. But Aisha's favorite experience was Disneyland.

Her first visit there was official, and there was too much protocol to permit much fun. The next morning Aisha said to some of the women who accompanied her on the trip, "We have a whole afternoon free today. Let's go back to Disneyland by ourselves. Let's even pay our own way!"

Avoiding the official entourage, the four girls sneaked off for the afternoon—and spent most of it riding again and again through Snow White's dark forest, where the leaping witch trees made them scream and giggle with terror and joy. Before they left Disneyland Aisha bought pictures of Mickey Mouse and Pinocchio and all the other Disney characters for her littlest sister's nursery; then, sighing, she returned to Los Angeles and another official banquet.

Back at home Aisha was setting style, for Moroccan women read in their papers that on public occasions in America the princess appeared in the native dress of Moroccan women—a long jeweled, embroidered or brocaded robe, gathered in by a jeweled belt. In the past these dresses were never seen outside the Moroccan home, for the tradition was that women must be so heavily covered when they went outdoors that not even the hem of their skirts must show. More becoming than Western clothes to the short, rather stocky Moroccan feminine figure, these robes were quickly adopted. Gold-threaded silk batistes, brilliant Indian brocades and swaying, heavy Moroccan earrings, chokers and pendants now adorn Rabat government and embassy receptions—worn by women who found the confidence to "emerge" because they now know they look their best.

Informally, Aisha prefers to wear Italian sports shirts and pedal pushers or slacks—sometimes a plain golf dress with a matching cardigan tossed casually over her shoulders. She usually wears light pink lipstick and matching fingernail and toenail polish. Her concern with dress does not seem intense, and she aroused some surprise when she remarked, after her first few days in the United States, that she was "interested to find that American women could be chic." American women in Morocco, unlike the French women there, dress informally for the climate—and do not consider Aisha's style sense outstanding.

Since her return to Morocco from America Aisha's life has settled into a routine of public duties and private family life. She is the head of a dozen charitable organizations, and frequently is invited to speak, to dedicate, to preside at bazaars, school graduations or cornerstone layings. Often she is invited to appear with her father and her elder brother; usually her father brings little Amina along—and Aisha and Moulay Hassan are kept busy trying to keep the three-year-old from trying to climb on her father's lap during ceremonies. Amina has been saved from many a platform tumble by the careful white-gloved hand of her big sister, reaching out quietly to restrain or rescue the wriggling child.

Aisha and Malika still share their own palace within the large palace compound, a sprawling, white-plastered building with flagged patios, splashing fountains, marble terraces and lush gardens. The same French couple who have been in charge of the household since the little palace was built eleven years ago have remained to "take care of the girls." The girls include not only the two princesses and their Spanish companion-secretary, but a fluctuating crowd of feminine cousins and friends, and a bevy of soft-speaking barefooted little serving girls. Male guards and chauffeurs and messengers have business occasionally at the palace, but on the whole the atmosphere is that of a girls' dormitory, with giggles and phone calls and banging doors, and glimpses down long corridors of pretty young girls rushing off on some suddenly important errand.

Until recently the two princesses shared the same room. It overflowed with books and phonograph records, and was furnished in the heavy, dark furniture which the sultan prefers and which he chose. Now Aisha has her own bedroom, furnished to her taste—light and airy with modern furniture of blond wood, with blue and yellow cushions and drapes. There are books, a radio, a record player—her record collection is large, particularly in the field of modern jazz. Louis Armstrong is a favorite.

In the downstairs section of the palace there is a huge carpeted hall, hung with chandeliers and paneled in green marble and dark wood. There the palace inmates gather two or three evenings a week to see the newest French and American movies, shown on a full-sized screen. Because it is used so often, the screen is never taken down.

Each of the princesses drives her own American car, or Italian sports car. Aisha drives well, and likes to go fast. Occasionally she is stopped by policemen for speeding—but she forgives them and apologizes after they have recognized her.

CHILD AT DUSK

By ALEXANDER D. TAYLOR

In the dusk with the given phonograph
The little girl outsings the barren years
Oblivious of the war's sad aftermath.
Not for these does she shed her tiny tears.

But for the little duckling, ugly and alone,
And for witch-haunted children in the dark.
She who calls all day friends on a toy telephone
Sees with the gradually coming night her friends embark.

Not for the mighty men fallen from their height
Or for the great and grandiose dead,
But for the doll in dusk fading from her sight
She weeps, feeling a mightier truth instead.

Malika and Aisha see much of their brothers and sisters. Nzah, now a pretty eighteen-year-old, lives in a California-style villa on the outskirts of Rabat with five girls of her own age and a French governess. She and her housemates attend the same French lycée where Aisha was educated, and share a passion for popular records and Paris fashions.

Last year this passion ran away with young Nzah: on a trip to Paris she was photographed for the newspapers in a black strapless evening dress she had bought at Jacques Fath. The next day she received a telegram from her shocked father: "If that is how you dress at seventeen, what on earth will you be wearing at twenty-five? Come home immediately."

Abdullah, at twenty-two, is a handsome, likable young-man-about-town, studying law with a private tutor. Hassan, now the official Crown Prince, is busy with the duties entailed by being the heir to an absolute monarchy. Both young men live in elegant little stone-and-glass villas outside Rabat, furnished with French antiques and Chinese bric-a-brac; both young men often invite their sisters to dinner, to parties or beach picnics. Hassan frequently serves food he obtains from one of the several American air bases in Morocco; he is devoted to American canned soups. Sometimes the whole family gathers together for dinner at the sultan's palace.

Anyone who knows the taboos of Morocco does not easily question a princess about her mother. A French journalist, however, did so recently.

"Do you see your mother?" she asked.

"A little every day," Aisha answered.

"How does she dress?"

"In the Moslem fashion."

"Are you friendly with her?"

"She is like a sister to me; she is only sixteen or seventeen years older than I am."

"What is her name?"

A long silence. "I cannot tell you."

Princess Aisha's friends do not talk of her easily. Like the first Aisha, the wife of the Prophet, she has been much maligned by gossip, and her loyal friends have learned to be careful. They are amiable, but around them there is still the faint atmosphere of fear, of mystery—the shrugged shoulder, the expressive Arab hand waved in a gesture of hopelessness, the voice murmuring, "But it is so difficult . . . so difficult!"

One of them, more Westernized than others but not enough to wish to be named, agreed, however, to describe Aisha's family life as she had seen it on numerous visits.

"The mother is a delightful and very intelligent woman," she said. "She speaks and reads perfect Arabic and is studying French. She is a handsome woman, slightly darker-skinned than the second wife. She drives her own car—veiled, of course. She runs the palace, and plans all the big receptions for delegations of women, and all that sort of thing.

"Lonely? Goodness, no! She's far too busy to be lonely; and anyway, lots of friends live in her section of the palace with her. And then she's with her family a lot too. In the summertime she often goes swimming at the beach with the sultan and the rest of the family—the private beach at the summer villa, of course. The girls keep teasing her, and borrowing her jewels and scarves and things like that, and she pretends to be cross but she really isn't. Naturally, they all wear bikinis at the beach—that's the only kind of chic bathing costume in France or in Morocco, and we all like to be chic even in private.

"Well, certainly the second wife is there on the beach, too—why not? They get along very well together, there's no jealousy at all. The second wife, lighter-skinned and very pretty, is still in her twenties. The royal mother is forty-five, so they're more like mother and daughter, you see.

"The mother is very curious about the world, and questions all the children a lot on what goes on outside. I think His Majesty would like to let her go unveiled. But he really can't. The public has just about accepted his daughters' coming out—as long as they don't come out too far—but they'd never stand for the sultan's wives' violating tradition. That would be too much."

The big question is how far is "too far." Too far is apparently the point at which the princess might meet or talk to unmarried Moroccan men. "She can go to a mixed dinner party, for instance," a friend reported, "but the hostess must be very careful in planning the other guests. Every man there must be accompanied by his wife; there must be no single young men and not even a married man whose wife is not present."

This restriction, imposed by a strict tradition which even the princess is unable to break, places her squarely in the middle of a dilemma. And the dilemma involves that question so often discussed in whispers, but never openly: When is she going to be married?

"Princess Aisha will never marry," said a Moroccan servant recently. "Her life is dedicated to the people of her country, and can never be dedicated to just one man."

"Nonsense!" said a friend. "She wants to marry and would be much better off if she were married."

"She is not, by nature, a leader," mused another.

There have been indications lately that Aisha has slowed down in her "leadership" of Moroccan women, that at twenty-seven she is weary of the role and anxious to turn it over to a still younger generation. The struggle for equality with men, and even for the vote, still has a long way to go.

"The older generation is not going to do anything," she once said. "It's the children who must revolutionize Morocco."

And another time she remarked sadly, "It is so much pleasanter to be skiing, or swimming, or riding somewhere, than to have to think about evolution and becoming modern, and learning the sciences."

"How can she be happy?" brooded another friend, a dashing girl with smart French clothes and a gay manner. "None of us are happy. "A Moroccan woman can be happy only after she is married—then she can go anywhere, do anything. Then life begins! But until then we unmarried women, even if we are unveiled, must think of the effect of everything we do, of our slightest gesture or word. And for a princess it is even worse.

"Aisha would like to marry a Moroccan—someone of ambassadorial status, for instance, would be ideal. And then she would like to settle down and be a good wife and mother and a happy private kind of person. She hopes, as we all do, that her husband will be contented with her and never take any other wives.

"The sultan is very modern, and refuses to pick a husband for her. To arrange a marriage, he thinks, would be an imposition. He says she can pick whom she chooses, as long as he is a Moslem.

"But how can she pick? The poor girl isn't even allowed to meet any Moslem young men. Oh, maybe she can meet one now and then at a reception or something, but it would be unthinkable for her to enter into a real conversation with him, to dance, to date or to flirt. They might meet at Hassan's or Abdullah's villa, but in that case the sultan would certainly not approve.

"The only way for her to get married is for some suitable young man to ask the sultan for her hand. But so far, no one has dared."

Marking time until the daring young man with the golden touch knocks at the gates of the palace and asks for the hand of the king's daughter in marriage, life goes on much as usual. Opening bazaars . . . swimming on the beach . . . horseback riding up in the mountains . . . long telephone conversations with friends . . . family parties . . . fast drives in the latest sports car through the golden fields of Morocco.

The lights are on late in the airy bedroom of the princess. Friends say that she reads in bed for hours every night, long after even the palace watchmen and their dogs are asleep. Friends say that she has taken to reading Jean Paul Sartre, André Malraux and the French existentialists. Friends say that the shy little princess is growing cynical.

She is caught, they think, between two worlds, at home in neither and lonely in between. Only love can fill that loneliness. But where is love? END

Will the sensitive machine stand up under the onslaught of the jet generation?

Now that our son has gone back to college after a fairly hectic weekend, our family car is beginning to quiet down again. It is a new car and normally it enjoys good health, but our son has always been in too great a hurry to get where he is going, or to come back from where he has been, to let the car really get to know him. It still trembles a bit when I start it, and there is a distinct irregularity in its breathing pattern, but I am convinced that it will be all right in a day or so, with a little gentleness and understanding. I have always had this sort of trouble with any car of ours, after our son has been allowed to use it, and I am prepared to be patient.

He thinks, my son, that this attitude of mine toward our car is preposterous, especially—gad!—in the father of an embryo engineer; but since I have learned that most embryo engineers regard any paternal attitude as preposterous, I do not allow myself to care what he thinks. I know he makes our car nervous, just as he frightens the freezer. Our freezer has a heart condition, an audible murmur, and I do not think it does it any good to slam the door shut with a foot, from three paces away. Someday it may just drop dead. And I have forbidden him to approach the television set. Our television set is very emotional, but it is ours, and we love it, and it has been hit on the top with a fist for the last time.

These modern children, born into a world where the machines that serve them already existed, have no idea of the individual quirks and idiosyncrasies, the personalities involved here, as do we who saw most of these machines come into being. Even the men who have invented the magic brain acknowledge that it has good days and bad, days when it makes mistakes for no reason at all, and it will go hard with succeeding generations if they forget this and begin to take the magic brain for granted.

When I was a boy we had no motorcar, and no machinery of any kind in the house. We did have electricity, which we always regarded in much the same manner as James Thurber's aunt, I believe it was, who went around screwing plugs into empty sockets, to keep the current from dripping out. We also had a telephone, which hung on the wall in the hall, and I clearly remember how my mother used to have to humor it. Some days it was just confused. When you took the receiver off the hook it babbled incoherent, unrelated conversations to you, all at the same time, and this was probably due to the fact, as mother said, that too many people tried to use it at the same time and its wires got hot and tired. When this happened mother made a point of not calling her neighbors for several days, until it had a chance to be rested.

I must admit that with this example of her concern for the telephone, my sister and I were plainly baffled by her attitude toward our new phonograph, when that arrived. On the inside of the top lid, when you raised it, was the familiar picture of the dog listening, with his head to one side, in front of an earlier phonograph horn. "His Master's Voice," it said below. My sister and I knew, however, that the master was not alone inside the box. There was a woman in there, too, because we often heard her voice from the open slats which slanted downward into the machine. We did not know if they were married or not, so we simply referred to them, discreetly, as "the man and the lady who live inside." We fed them fresh bread, rolled into pellets, which we pushed through the open slats. Mother reprimanded us when she discovered this, and said that we were not to do it again. This cruelty shocked us. (Was she really our own mother, after all, or some wicked stepmother who had snatched us from our rightful cribs?) Anyway, after that we always waited until she was gone to feed the phonograph. It played better afterward.

But naturally, with this sort of early conditioning, I have a protective feeling about the machinery in my own house, and it disturbs me that I cannot inculcate this attitude of manly responsibility in my son. Not only does the freezer have a weak heart, but the refrigerator has its off days, too, when it just seems too exhausted to go on, and you have to take the plug out of the wall and turn it over, to give it a fresh viewpoint. You don't call a serviceman for these minor complaints, just as you don't call the doctor when you have a common cold. You just have to get to know the constitutions of your machines so that you will be able to judge when love and personal care must give way to impersonal professional attention.

Our son was more understanding about the old furnace, I will have to admit. It was in place when we bought the house, an old house with a coal furnace in which a ring for an oil burner had been installed. It was the most disagreeable oil ring I have ever known. It went into action angrily, as if imposed upon; it roared loudly the whole time it was working; and it shut itself off with an offensive hiss, rather like a Bronx cheer. In my opinion it resented city dwellers who came to buy country houses from old residents. It dried out the entire house with its baleful breath. There was a water pan for evaporation which had been left in place in the old furnace, and we tried to keep this filled, pouring water in from a basin, in what was rather like a ceremony intended to placate a vengeful minor deity. "Would you please water the furnace, son?" was a familiar request around our house during those years. He always did it willingly. Visitors looked puzzled, but we gave up trying to explain.

We finally had to send the whole thing packing. It made us feel too unwanted in our own house. The new furnace is much better adjusted. It has a benign, happy sound about it when it is called into duty, and on especially cold mornings, when I turn up the thermostat, it has a little song it sings, quite cheerfully. Sometimes on a winter night I wake up and hear it humming to itself below, and I am tempted to go down and sit with it to keep it company, as I did one afternoon in the early winter when it developed a leak somewhere which could not be found, and I had to watch its poor dials as they struggled to keep their equilibrium, while the furnaceman went around upstairs testing the pressure in the radiators.

I suppose my son will have to be a family man and the head of his own household before he will learn to cherish and understand the virtues and the weaknesses of his machines. We have an alarm clock, for example, which sometimes becomes quite hysterical, setting up a wild whir of protest in its wheels and springs, and it has to be put down carefully on its face until it grows calm again. I think I know what caused this condition. A neighbor boy, cutting grass at so much an hour, took it outside to time himself with, and forgot it there, overnight. It rained. I brought it in in the morning, soaking wet. I couldn't find the light machine oil, so I poured olive oil into all its little openings, and then put it on a pie tin in the oven, set at 350°, for an hour and a half. It has worked fine ever since, but I think it never really recovered from its traumatic experience.

My greatest problem now, the sort of concern a man feels for his least favored child, is with our new washer-dryer, which has had a terrible time adjusting itself to its environment. When we first used it, it shook so much that I had a special platform built under it to give it a sense of security. The laundry room is directly below the room in which I am working, and I have given up trying to do any original work on Monday mornings, in spite of my wife's protests that she will take care of it. She has a thoughtless tendency to load it, turn it on, and then go outside to garden, or up to the attic to read old love letters. In such moments I drop whatever I am trying to do, and sit upstairs and think positive thoughts, and listen. Now it is going into its rinse, I say, holding my breath, and timing it with my watch. Will it get up its nerve to go into a spin? We did call the repairman once, and that was a mistake. It couldn't remember how to get from washing to drying on one particular Monday morning when my wife went upstairs to sort out her bureau drawers after I had gone to the post office, and the poor thing just kept trying over and over again without success for about twenty minutes. The repairman, when he came, was a callous, insensitive type, who looked as if he might enjoy pulling the wings off flies, and before I knew what he was doing he had ripped out the whole inside of the machine and spread it all over the floor. He was so noisy in his work that I went down to see what was going on.

"It's a delicate piece of machinery," I said, wincing as he jabbed at its intestines with a red-hot soldering iron. "Why be so rough with it?"

"Huh?" he said, giving me an odd, rather frightened look.

I went back to my study with dignity, and waited until he had gone. The machine was running when he left, but after a minute or so it made a sound like a sob or a hiccup (between the second rinse and the spin), and stopped, with a sigh. I went down and shut it off. I let it rest for a few minutes while I smoked a cigarette. Then I turned it back to the beginning and started it off again, gently, holding my hand on top, for comfort. It went through the whole cycle without any trouble at all. I think it will be all right now if we just keep that repairman away.

There was one incident while our son was at home this weekend which has given me some hope. He has acquired a car for himself, an ancient coupé of some unidentifiable persuasion, which has a rather Victorian look about it, and which, for some reason, brings the name Adelbert to my mind. I have not been invited to ride in it since its trial run, when I courteously volunteered to chop wood for the boiler whenever that was needed. It cost $37.50, I believe, and runs fine if you can start it from the top of a hill. Actually, my son says, it will be a better car than ours, when he gets it fixed—which, come to think of it, may partly explain why our own car is so upset after he leaves. He spent all Sunday afternoon waxing his car's finish, and admiring the glow, before he put it away. And then, while we were in our car, ready to return him to school, he had to go back to the barn just once more to "check something." I like to think that he went to tell it good-by. Sometimes a father just has to go on faith that his son will turn out to be a responsible man. END kissed me. I would have died if he hadn't—honest. I was ready to trip or fall overboard or anything, just so he'd show that he liked me, and maybe kiss me. Already I liked him a lot. He's a very attractive boy—everybody he meets likes him.

WHEN IS LOVE WRONG?

"But that's all there was to it then. He went back to college where he was studying on a G.I. grant, and I went back to my job. After a month he wrote me, just a chatty note enclosing some snaps, and I wrote back. Then I didn't hear from him until nearly the end of the summer. I thought, 'Oh, well, it was just one of those things, I guess.' But two days before I was to leave on my vacation in August at that same little seaside hotel, I got a letter from him saying he was planning a vacation there, too, on the exact same dates! He was surprised and happy to see me, and it was a wonderful vacation—sailing and swimming and walking on the beach and picnicking. And almost every night we sat up late talking about everything in the world. Jim loves to talk, and so do I. We just keep on and on.

"I didn't hear from him for about a month. Then he finally wrote and asked if I'd like to go camping with him the next weekend. I did, and we had just a nice friendly time, although by this time of course he was kissing me, and I was beginning to realize I was in love with him. A few weekends later I drove up to his town—about a hundred miles away—for a football game, and after that we started seeing each other almost every weekend. Either he'd come down to my place, or I'd go up to his town. He'd get me a room in a motel and leave me there after our dates. And all the time we were getting more and more interested in each other, more and more mentally and physically attracted. It was getting so we didn't want to be apart for a moment.

"Anyway, one football weekend in November, he couldn't find a room for me anywhere except in a motel fifteen miles out of town. He took me there late at night and it was raining. Somehow it seemed foolish for him to drive all the way back in the rain—and anyway, it seemed so natural and right that he should stay. So he did, and that was the first time. I've felt ever since that I was married to him, 'for better or worse.'

"But I told him, 'I'm going to do this because I love you very much, and I hope that's why you're doing it too. If you ever change, so that I'm just a woman to you, and not me, please don't bother any more.' He said he loved me—although it was never easy for him to say the words—and I think he did, at the time.

"I was so sure that we were going to be married. And whenever I wondered about maybe having a baby someday, Jim would say, 'If I like a girl well enough to get her in trouble, I'll certainly like her well enough to marry her!'

"After that, it was just about every weekend, and sometimes even in the middle of the week he'd drive that hundred miles at night just to be with me for a few hours. We used to laugh and say that we could write a guidebook to all the motels in his town and mine!

"All during this early part I really believed he was going to marry me, and I guess I kept on believing it right up until I finally signed the adoption papers for the baby. I remember the first time he asked me to marry him, sitting in the car late one night outside his dormitory. 'I guess we might get married,' he said. And then he went, 'Woo-oo! What I said!' He'd talk that way every weekend I came up to see him, and then a couple of days later I'd get a phone call and he'd say, 'Jenny, I just can't go through with it. I can't. I want to be free.' Jim doesn't like a girl hanging on to him, but I kept thinking that if he just got the habit of me he'd finally see that I'd make him a good wife. After all, we like the same things—talking and sailing, for instance—and we never got tired of each other. I wouldn't tie him down—I'd go anywhere with him.

"This went on for four months, more or less the same. Jim was talking marriage more and more, so I started collecting a trousseau and buying household stuff. And I even told my mother that Jim had asked me to marry him, and we thought we'd be married sometime in the summer or early fall.

"Oh, why don't we listen more to our mothers! Mother liked Jim all right, but she warned me he would be unstable in the long run. But I wouldn't listen to her—I was too much in love. I would have jumped over the moon for him then.

"At Eastertime the lady who ran that seaside hotel asked us if we'd come and take care of the place while she went South for a week, and we did. One other man was staying there, a middle-aged lawyer and bachelor. He had a sour attitude about women, and we used to sit up late at night talking about it. I'd argue with him like mad, and Jim would just sit there listening, not saying a word. I often wonder whether that man's ideas had anything to do with the way Jim seemed to change after Easter. Or maybe it was because I'd skipped a period and thought I might be pregnant—when I finally got the next period he seemed more relieved than I was! But whatever it was, he'd changed.

"That spring I found out that Jim was going out with his old girl, Sally. He'd invite me up for a weekend and then he'd just dump me somewhere and disappear with Sally. I used to ask his roommate to go find him, and after a few hours they'd come back. I didn't like the situation, but I thought that if I just stuck around he'd find out how faithful I was. He's always saying that women are faithless. Sometimes I wonder whether his mother's death when he was a child made him feel that way—but I guess I don't know enough psychology to figure him out. I just know he's been hurt.

"In late May we had a kind of reconciliation when he invited me up for a big college weekend. I guess that's when I got pregnant. And in June he took a job as a counselor in a very remote camp for boys and girls in New England, and got me a job there too. I quit my library job, and I thought it was going to be a wonderful summer. But it turned out to be a nightmare.

"From the moment we got there, Jim hardly spoke to me. I knew he was worried about Sally and about me and about the bad grades he'd been getting—he's really bright, but he likes to argue with the professors—so I left him alone for a while. But it used to burn me up that at every mail call there'd be a letter to him from Sally, and I guessed that he must be writing her too. Once in a while we'd get away from the camp and be together, but I knew it wasn't the way it used to be—he was just doing it.

I am convinced that the truths about God and man, about right and wrong, for which the Christian gospel stands, are man's indispensable necessity.

"Then in June I missed a period. I didn't say anything to Jim, but I started worrying. In July I missed another, and I began feeling kind of sick whenever I went horseback riding with the kids. So one day I took some time off and rode a bus to the nearest town, about twenty miles away. I found a clinic, and told them I had only an hour between buses, and could I please see a doctor? I used Jim's name, as if I were really married. So then I saw a doctor, and he said he thought I was probably pregnant.

"That night I got Jim away from the crowd, and told him about it. Right away he said we'd be married and he talked about veterans' housing and said he'd write to a friend and make all the arrangements. That's one reason I never seriously thought about an abortion—I really believed he was going to marry me, and I kept on believing right up to this very minute. That night was the last time he ever said he loved me.

"The next day, though, he was almost like a different person. He avoided me, he wouldn't talk to me. This went on for several days, and I didn't know what was the matter. I felt we had to get things straight, so late one night when I could see he was alone in his tent, I went to him and begged him to talk to me, at least. 'I can't marry you, Jenny,' he said. 'I just can't. Go away. I don't love you any more. I don't even like you.' So I went away. He talked that way several times that summer, and once he hit me. I don't want to talk about that, though. He didn't mean it.

"My contract with the camp still had another month to run, and I didn't feel I could break it. Anyway, I still thought that if I stuck around, Jim and I would have a better chance of patching things up than if I went away. And as time went on we did start joking again, and talking, although never about anything serious.

"At the end of the season we hitchhiked home with Mary, a counselor who had been my roommate and who knew all about the situation. Home, I'd decided, was going to have to be in Jim's college town, close to him and far enough from my parents. We had a lot of fun on the way—Jim's wonderful fun when he's not worried. But then we got there, all three of us riding a bus by this time, and Jim just got off the bus and walked away. He never oked back, and he never said good-by. That is one of the worst moments, I guess.

"Anyway, I went to stay with Mary until I und a room and a job. I didn't really have y plans—I just knew I'd have to support my- lf until the baby came, and that it was too e by now for a safe abortion. Anyway, I anted a baby terribly, and I thought that mehow I'd convince Jim so that I could keep baby. 'If I could just get him to live with e,' I used to tell Mary, 'I'm sure he'd find out w nice and comfortable it would be to be arried.'

"Although he knew where I was, Jim didn't ephone. But one night he showed up with lly. I saw them coming, and I sneaked out e back way, because I couldn't bear seeing em together. I sat in my car and waited for em to come out. Then I followed them all e way back to Sally's house, because I was termined to talk to Jim alone, and I couldn't to his college dormitory.

"When I saw him come out of Sally's, I got t of the car and stopped him as he was get- g into his car. It was one of the few times I as ever angry or cold with him. 'There are st three things I want from you, Jim,' I told m. 'I want three hundred dollars to pay the doctor and hospital bills. I don't want to be left alone at Thanksgiving and Christmas. And I want someone around when it comes time for the baby's birth. That's all. I won't ask anything else.' 'O.K.,' he promised. 'You'll have all three.' And he drove away. He kept his promise too.

"After that I read newspaper ads for rooms to rent, and I found just what I wanted—a nice room and kitchenette and dining nook in a private house on a residential street. Thirteen dollars a week, furnished. I bought myself a gold wedding ring for two and a half and told the landlord that I was married, but that my husband was working on a job in another state, and I didn't know when he'd get home. Then I found a good doctor only two blocks away, and I told him the same story—thank heavens he went on vacation two days before the baby was delivered, so I didn't have to tell him the truth. I don't know what I'll do when I have to go back for a checkup—I feel too ashamed and embarrassed to tell him about it. Maybe I'll just skip the checkup.

"Then I got a job as a receptionist in a bank—it seems they're so desperate for help these days they don't mind pregnant receptionists. I did a little filing on the side and "I MADE IT... and I make sure that the best materials and workmanship go into any product with my name on it. Naturally, people blame me if my product is unsatisfactory, and they stop buying it. I can't risk turning out anything that may be only 'second-best.' "

"I SOLD IT... recommended it because the name it has made for itself tells me it's one of the best, most up-to-date products in its field. In fact, a good brand name is the best guarantee my customers can have when they buy. And for me, too . . . I know they'll buy it again."

"I BOUGHT IT... because it's an advertised brand I can trust completely. I just won't risk my family's welfare on some product I don't know anything about—even when they say it's 'just as good.' I feel safer, somehow, when I stick to a brand I know I can depend on."

earned about fifty dollars a week, and that was enough to live on. But the hardest part was the other girls in the bank—they all took such a friendly interest in my 'condition' and they kept wanting to know what my husband was like, and what I was going to name the baby, and they kept talking about how beautiful and happy I looked. Happy, huh!

"I was worried all the time about my parents' finding out, of course. Before I began showing I went home for a few weekends, and I told them I had a job for the winter and spring in Jim's town. After I started showing I just kept writing them I was too busy to come see them—but what really frightened me was the idea that one or the other of them might get awfully sick, and send for me. And just before I had to put on maternity clothes, I had a scare when an old friend from my home town happened to drop in. She didn't really guess, but she looked at me kind of suspiciously and said, 'Jenny, are you still wearing size nine?' I told her sure I was, but she looked doubtful.

"At first I was sort of lonely, but after a few weeks Jim called up—he'd found out where I lived from Mary—and asked if I'd keep his dog for a while for him. I liked the dog, so I said O.K. After that Jim started dropping around two or three times a week, mostly to see the dog, I guess. Then I started cooking supper for him, and he seemed to think it was better than dormitory food, because he started coming by almost every night. I didn't care why he came, as long as he was there, talking to me.

"One night, though, I really blew up at him. His car was out of commission, so without even asking me he came and took mine to take Sally out on a date—he already had one of my spare keys. At first I thought the car was stolen, but when I found out what had happened, I really hit the ceiling. I told him to get his stuff out that he'd been leaving around the place, and never to see me again. I was really mad, as mad as I've ever been.

"All of a sudden he got very tender and loving. He apologized and said it would never happen again. So all right, I'm a fool, I know I'm a fool, but I forgave him and let him stay. That night, and a few times after, we had intercourse. But I didn't feel right about it, and I know I would never feel right about it again—unless we were married, of course.

"Thanksgiving he stayed with me, and all I remember is that I seemed to spend the whole day cooking. But Christmas was the hardest. I couldn't go home, because I was seven months pregnant, and I showed. So I wrote my parents I was spending Christmas with Jim's family they were hurt, but they weren't as hurt they would have been if they'd known t truth. So anyway, we stayed here and I cook a ham we'd won playing bingo at a movie few nights before. I gave Jim a shirt and sweater, and he gave me perfume and a b jacket and a sailing cap. On my birthday February he gave me five dollars, and I spe it all on a nightgown for the hospital.

"I felt fine all during the last two months my pregnancy, partly because Jim was ba and was acting nice most of the time. course when he had trouble with his math, he often does, then he'd feel awful, and have to comfort him and jolly him out of The trouble with Jim is he just thinks he's good. That's one reason he said he wouldn marry me—he said a no-good husband a father wouldn't be right for me or the bab

"I used to beg him to marry me, just so could keep the baby, and I'd even promise hi I'd divorce him afterward. But he didn't b lieve I'd ever let him go, once I had him. Ju the same, he was pretty good to me, on and o He can be very tender and considerate, but course he's all kind of mixed up inside and th means that he isn't the most stable person the world, to say the least. For instance, can't stand me crying. Sometimes in the nig I just couldn't help it, but he'd wake up a say, 'Oh, shut up!' And so I'd try to stop.

"Just the same, in January and February felt so optimistic that he'd give in at the l minute that I even went shopping for the ba in lunch hours and after work. I bet I kn every baby store in town—I spent all my spa time wandering around them, and I boug diapers and blankets and little nightgow Just in case some miracle would let me bri the baby home, I wanted to have somethi ready for the poor little thing!

"I quit work two weeks before the baby w due, and the girls at the office gave me a lot baby presents. I don't know what I'll do if ever see those girls again—tell them the bab died, I guess. But I probably won't—Jim's g ing away on a trip this summer, and then I going home to try to begin all over again. have to stay for a while, anyway, because can't work yet, and Jim is paying all my bill I've only got twenty dollars right now.

"Anyway, that's how the plans are. But Jim should change his mind, even now, well, guess I'd still marry him. Oh, for months ar months I've watched him chip away all my b lief and faith and trust in him, and I real know he's no good. But he just has to look at me and grin—and I'm lost. I don't trust him, I don't even like him very much. But I love him.

"Frankly, [redacted] hadn't intended to put down thirty-thousand-dollar roots."

"I know I'm a fool, and I guess it's too late to help me any. But I hope other girls won't be as foolish as I am. I wish they could know beforehand what I've learned: I'll never again believe anything a man tells me until I get a real wedding ring on my finger. And from now on I'm going to ask from men a little bit more for me and give a little bit less to them.

"I haven't lost faith or hope, of course. In fact, I'm keeping this box of little bootees and caps and everything for the other baby I'm going to have someday. Lots of babies, I hope, even if I can't ever forget this one, or stop wondering where she is or how she is. It's funny: I used to want the baby so I could keep Jim—but at the end I wanted Jim so I could keep the baby.

"I kept on hoping until the last minute that I could keep her, but the day before I was due I finally decided that I had better face up to the fact that I'd have to give up the baby for adoption. So I went to the hospital and talked to the social worker there and told her the whole situation. She was awfully nice and straightforward, and arranged for me to have a 'confidential admission' to the hospital, so that no one could check up on me. She agreed with me that in my case it was out of the question for me to keep the baby, unless Jim married me. Like everyone else who knows about us, she thinks that Jim has been terrible—I can't seem to convince anyone that this whole thing is as much my fault as his. After all, I should have known what I was getting into. I'm convinced, though, that you never know anyone until you've lived with him a long, long time.

"Anyway, the labor pains finally started at two-thirty one morning in March. I pottered around for a couple of hours, packing things, and at four-thirty I woke Jim up and told him. He said I was probably imagining it, but since I was ten days late, I said no—the pains were seven minutes apart. So then we telephoned the substitute doctor and the hospital, and they told me to come right in. Jim drove me there, dropped my suitcase at the reception desk, patted my shoulder and said 'So long.' Then he scooted off. I do wish, though, that he had stayed—it would have been easier knowing that he was there in the hospital. Easier for him too. He was really awfully worried about me.

"Late that morning the doctor gave me a shot which made everything fuzzy. But I remember the delivery, and somebody saying it was a seven-pound girl. And I looked at her then, and saw that she was beautiful. Then I went to sleep.

"The next day Jim came to see me. He didn't bring flowers, but he brought what must have been ten little bags of cashew nuts—seemed as if he was pulling them out of every pocket! He knows how much I like them. He came to see me every day, but he didn't ask to see the baby.

And when I left the hospital he sent Sally to bring me home. I guess he was afraid someone would ask him whether he was the father, or something. Jim doesn't like to take responsibility, you know.

"The second day after she was born, I asked the social worker to let me see my baby. Somehow I just had to, to know what she was like. A nurse brought her in and I held her for five minutes, patting her and loving her and making sure that she had come into the world healthy and perfect. Me, a mother! I couldn't believe it then, and I still can't. She had blond hair and blue eyes, and she just lay there quietly and sweetly, while I held her in my arms. I was the one crying, not she.

"Then they took her away, and I didn't ask to see or hold her again. I couldn't bear it, I simply couldn't bear it. But four or five times a day I used to wander down the corridor and look through the nursery windows, trying to find her. I think I did, and I used to stand there, staring in at her and loving her through the glass wall.

"I felt like a little kid without any money, looking in a candy-store window. That's why, the day I left after I'd signed the adoption papers, I walked straight by, and didn't turn my head to look at the nursery. If I had, I would have run in and grabbed her, and never let her go. Never, never, never." parties, nurses and attendants are kept busy helping select just the right fragrance (for the ladies), seeing to it that party dresses and shirts are back from the laundry in time, and escorting everyone to the courtroom—where for lack of recreational space parties in the psychiatric unit are held.

DO WE GIVE THE MENTALLY ILL A CHANCE?

"When I first realized I was ill," an aged man confides to the nurse as he shuffles down the corridor to the party, "I thought I was never going to have any fun again."

In the courtroom the record player is going full blast and the teacher, a volunteer from a local dance studio, is lining up couples for his class. There are certain rules for the volunteers, such as, "Never turn your back on a patient—but only so as not to exclude him from the group," and "Volunteers should not stand and talk together or dance together." But occasional minor infractions of this latter rule are permitted because it is often difficult to tell who is a patient and who is a volunteer!

There are no rules for patients, though. Those who so choose may sit all evening on the side lines just watching. But this rarely happens. Everyone is so eager to participate that occasionally, for lack of men partners, two girls will dance together. Doctors report that after the parties everyone sleeps well, and with fewer sleeping pills than usual.

At Stanford, a private hospital with facilities for 19 psychiatric patients, volunteers work much more closely with patients than at San Francisco Hospital. In the small but cheerful sunroom, playing cards for an afternoon or working on a knotted belt or finger painting, the volunteer comes to know more about a patient and may even develop a strong attachment.

"It's hard to be objective," Mrs. Harris, the craft teacher, tells a new volunteer, "but if you're not, your value as a volunteer goes down."

The new volunteer may meet a woman with scars on her wrists from a suicide attempt; a young girl walking around aimlessly, her head in the clouds; an elderly gentleman who tells of having built many famous bridges.

"This work is so gratifying," Mrs. Harris says. She can't explain why in so many words, but she can point to a gray-haired woman in a pink bouffant negligee who for days has sat watching others make stuffed dogs of felt, protesting all the while, "I could never do that."

"Today," Mrs. Harris smiles, "that woman mustered up all her confidence, asked me for a needle and thimble and went to work on a little brown dachshund."

Mental illness is largely social maladjustment, the young resident on the Stanford ward feels, and the problem is to learn to get along with people. This is where the volunteers are helping. "They don't wear uniforms, for one thing," he says, "and that means they're here only because they want to be. That's important to someone who feels rejected by society and needs incentive to face community life."

"But once you are outside the hospital, all your problems seem to begin all over again," one little gray-haired woman has confided to Miss Boddinghouse at Fellowship Club. The Association for Mental Health, through its Fellowship Club and its Employment Committee, is trying to minimize those problems as much as possible. And there are encouraging stories of success. Bob S. recently reported at Fellowship Club that he had at last told his employer about his illness. "You know what he said?" Bob asked. "'You just go back to your desk and don't worry about it. Take a seventeen-room house, add seven lively children—and the result is a perpetual state of emergency, according to Marjorie Riley, mother of this month's How America Lives family. "In a home like this, everything gets to be a crisis." And that is exactly why we decided to ask Marjorie about her ideas of home management.

Coping

By MARGARET DAVIDSON
Homemaking Editor

Does she have a system? The "be-prepared" school may have its supporters, but Marjorie Riley isn't one of them, she says! "When I read all the wonderful ways of doing things systematically, I am struck with a sense of my own shortcomings." Actually, although she claims to be free-wheeling, there is an underlying pattern about who does what that smooths out daily life. Some people feel bogged down without a plan, others too regimented with one. Perhaps like most of us, Marjorie finds a compromise best. "I cannot lay claim to much more than a dream of a well-ordered, beautifully run home and family—but we have fun." Everyone pitches in to help.

PARTIES ARE AN INCENTIVE. A party of any kind—and there are many—is powerful motivation for getting the house clean, Marjorie has found. "The only times I have great and violent emotions about house cleaning is just before we entertain. Then things get done so quickly we don't think of methods. A sort of pinnacle of feverish activity is reached during which we polish silver, scrub bathrooms, haul out old magazines, clean kitchen drawers and sweep walks until finally, self-consciously clean and tidy but pale and shaking with fatigue, we open the door for the first guests." When Margaret and Ellen invite the "gang," they make their own refreshments—trays of brownies and date bars, and a beautiful punch for the cut-glass bowl.

MONEY MATTERS. When Margaret and Ellen were younger, they were paid for tasks. Cleaning a bathroom was twenty cents; washing dishes, five cents; sweeping steps, ten cents; French-door windowpanes, one cent.

"I thought they would get rich on the dining room alone—one hundred and two little panes! I soon learned, however, that with as much as a quarter saved up they had no wish to earn more. Keeping the girls and boys busy was contingent upon keeping them penniless. As soon as they finished a chore, I urged them to hurry two blocks down to the dime store to spend their money. Finally they decided their thirty-five-cents-a-week allowance was sufficient for all their needs.

"They still do the windows and I pay them for the job. They do the dishes just because they are part of the family, and they keep their rooms clean (under duress, it is true) because they themselves occupy them. Other tasks, such as silver polishing, errand running and baby sitting, they are paid for—if not with money, with a gift, often clothing."

MANY HANDS. "You might call us a 'do-it-yourself' family," Marjorie's husband offers helpfully. "When we ask you to do something you just say, 'Do it yourself.'"

Even 12-year-old Brendan and 9-year-old Timmy keep their rooms clean, and little Mike, 6, is learning to put things away neatly and run errands. Tim waters the lawn. Margaret and Elly make up school lunches in the morning, set the supper table, make their own clothes, do their own ironing and bathe the babies, $3\frac{1}{2}$-year-old Sheila and $1\frac{1}{2}$-year-old Megan. Plus that, the two older girls have wrapped packages in department stores during the Christmas holidays and held clerks' jobs at the county fair. And Brendan has two paper routes—one in the morning, one in the evening. In one year he put over $400 in the bank, now has more than $700.

"See why I don't get too alarmed over all the things they don't do?"

MAJOR BREAKDOWNS. "The day the washer broke down was well on its way to being a crisis," Marjorie says, but she bought a new machine over the telephone from an astonished salesman. "Don't you

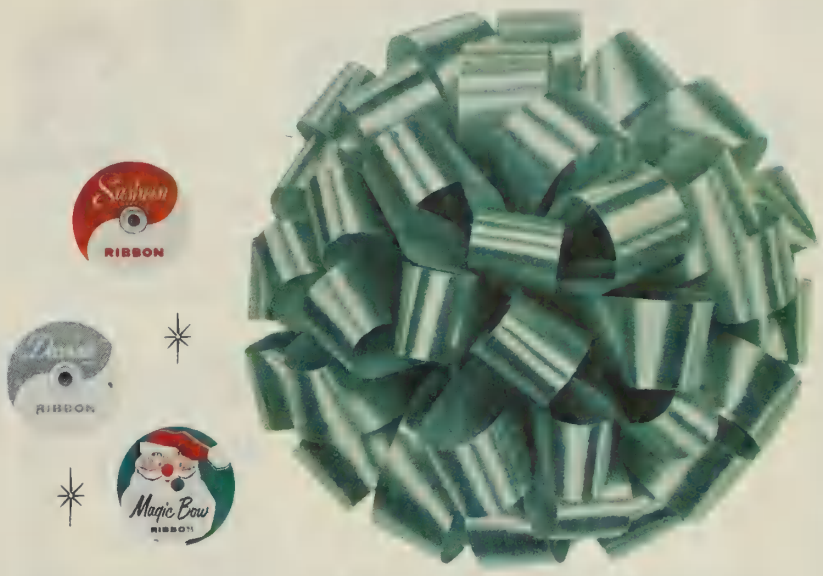
vant to come in," he asked, "and try it ut?" Marjorie said no—if a machine ad been pronounced washworthy by actory designers and experts she was ure any defects in its operation would ot be apparent to her, as long as it would et clothes clean.

"Without a washer we would be sub-nerged in piles of laundry. Four tubfuls re done each day, and when I think of he women who used to wash by hand or families bigger than ours, I'm speech-ess with what almost amounts to rever-nce."

The two older girls began doing their wn ironing when they were very small, lthough their school uniforms were done or them until they were twelve. "We've ever looked the same since," Margaret nd Ellen say ruefully. Actually, Mar-orie says, their ironing results are very ood, "and having to do it has had a eadying influence! School and date resses that used to be worn once and hen tossed in the laundry heap are now arefully hung up, pressed and repressed."

THE FLOOD. "Crises always seem o spur us on to our best joint efforts." ne such, happily survived, happened eptember 15th, a day long set aside for quarterly Ladies' Aid meeting. At A.M. Brendan called up to his mother hat there was a flood in his bathroom nd right then four other bathrooms eluged too.



While committee clubwomen arrived at the house bearing platters of cookies, the plumber was trying to find the blocked main line and men were digging up the back yard. "At five P.M. the grounds looked like a foxhole and the plumber blithely announced, 'quittin' time.'"

Marjorie pleaded. He worked on and forty-five minutes later found the line, by 6:15 had everything running. At 7:30 a houseful of guests arrived. "We had a lovely party. It had all seemed dire at the time, but like all our crises, after it was solved it made a good story." The moral, if any, Marjorie thinks, is that all you can do in an emergency is do something but don't waste time fretting.

SICK-BAY BLUES. Six cases of mumps and three of measles in a two-month period were all nursed back to health by Marjorie. "I rather loved the look of the upstairs infirmary—with Wyman, Michael, Brendan, Sheila, Megan and Tim lying quietly and helplessly in bed, giving me weak and grateful smiles when I brought them food, tea, magazines or conversation. The house was so silent and serene; since the ones who mess it up were all sick, it stayed gleamingly clean; and the flowers from well-wishers made me feel cherished. All these lofty thoughts faded away," Marjorie says, "when the patients began to get better and the halls echoed with a cacophony of 'Mommeeeeee' with occasionally a deep-toned 'Marjorie!' from Wyman thrown in for variety.

"Remembering those days—the countless trays Margaret and Ellen carried upstairs, the paper dolls they cut out for Sheila, the TV set they rolled from room to room for various patients, the records they played to amuse the little ones—I realize that whenever they are needed they are wonderful, and always rise to meet an emergency."

Wyman's office sent over a complete roast-beef dinner one night to all the patients, too, and Marjorie includes friends as among the "indispensable aids" of running a household.

AWAY FROM IT ALL. "There are times," Marjorie admits, "when it would be very nice indeed to run away and be a pirate," when the household business closes in around you. "I find my little 'island of serenity' by going for an entire weekend to a retreat house. Maybe it's the three days' rest and all the quiet and good food. Whatever it is, I come back with a new lease on life. Those infrequent weekends are the only times I have ever left the children in their entire lives. But that, in my case, is no special virtue. I really prefer the walls of my home to anywhere else in the world."

KITCHEN MANEUVERS. Providing food for a family like the Rileys is a large-scale operation. "Twenty-seven meals a day, any way you look at it," mused Marjorie. "But looking at it that way it sounds a little hopeless. Of course, it isn't when you take one meal at a time."

From the time they were small, the older girls were allowed to make anything they wished in the kitchen, on the condition that they clean up afterward—"and that put a brake on their housewifely instincts!" The happy result: they potter creatively and never chaotically. "Ellen, without a doubt, is the world's champion peanut-butter-cooky maker. Margaret leans toward cake frostings—she uses cake mixes with no apology, but the frostings are her own concoctions." Suppers are often simple, and served in one dish or casserole—spaghetti, fried chicken, salads are all favorites. Everybody helps—"some serve, others carry dishes back to the kitchen."

AS TIME GOES ON. "We enjoy being together and try to keep Sunday as our 'family day.' Wyman saves his time, then, for all of us, too, and would never go off to the golf course and miss it. Lots of times on Sunday mornings he'll even get up a little early to make some French pancakes." As they go along Marjorie finds to her pleasure that "the older children are turning out to be guides and helpers to the little ones. When Mike, aged all of six, had to go to the dentist this year, I sent him with Brendan and Tim to go and 'watch' first. Later he informed me that at the next appointment the dentist would take him, and he marched up after school and had a tooth filled. And of course we used to read bedtime stories to the two older girls, and then they read to the boys, and now the boys are reading the same stories to the littlest girls." And Marjorie concludes happily that "while I planned to spend my old age writing, I have the feeling I'll be passing on my 'systems' to the whole flock of grandchildren after I fix the rooms over for them."

THE STORY OF HOLLY AND IVY

Ivy was a little girl six years old with straight hair cut in a fringe, blue-gray eyes and a turned-up nose. She had a green coat the color of her name and red gloves, but no lady or gentleman had asked for her for Christmas. "I don't care," said Ivy.

Sometimes in Ivy there was an empty feeling and the emptiness ached; it ached so much that she had to say something quickly in case she cried and, "I don't care at all," said Ivy.

"You will care," said the last boy, Barnabas, who was waiting for a taxi. "Cook has gone, the maids have gone, and Miss Shepherd is going to her sister. You will care."

"I won't," said Ivy and she said more quickly, "I'm going to my grandmother."

"You haven't got a grandmother," said Barnabas. "We don't have them." That was true. The boys and girls at St. Agnes' had no fathers and mothers, let alone grandmothers.

"But I have," said Ivy, "at Aylesbury."

I do not know how that name came into Ivy's head. Perhaps she had heard it somewhere. She said it again: "In Aylesbury."

"Bet you haven't," said Barnabas, and he went on saying that until his taxi came.

When Barnabas had gone Miss Shepherd said, "Ivy, I shall have to send you to the country, to our infants' home. There is nowhere else for you to go."

"I'll go to my grandmother," said Ivy.

"You haven't got a grandmother," said Miss Shepherd. "I'm sorry to send you to the infants' home, for there won't be much for you to see there or anyone to talk to, but I don't know what else to do with you. My sister has influenza and I have to go and nurse her."

"I'll help you," said Ivy.

"You might catch it," said Miss Shepherd. "That wouldn't do," and she took Ivy to the station and put her on the train.

She put Ivy's suitcase in the rack and gave her a packet of sandwiches, an apple, a ticket, two shillings, and a parcel that was her Christmas present; onto Ivy's coat she pinned a label with the address of the infants' home. "Be a good girl," said Miss Shepherd.

When Miss Shepherd had gone Ivy tore the label off and threw it out the window. "I'm going to my grandmother," said Ivy.

All day long people came into and out of the toyshop. Mr. Blossom and Peter were so busy they could hardly snatch a cup of tea.

Crumple was made into a parcel and taken away; Teddy bears and sailing ships were brought out of the window, dolls were lifted down from the shelf. The boy doll in the kilt and the doll with gloves were sold, and baby dolls and brides.

Holly held out her arms and smiled her china smile.

"I am here. I am Holly," she said and she wished, "Ask for me. Lift me down. Ask!" but nobody asked.

"Hoo! Hoo!" said Abracadabra.

Ivy was still in the train. She had eaten her sandwiches and opened her present. She had hoped and believed she would have a doll this Christmas, but the present was a pencil box. A doll would have filled up the emptiness and now it ached so much that Ivy had to press her lips together tightly and, "My grandmother will give me a doll," she said out loud.

"Will she, dear?" asked a lady sitting opposite, and the people in the carriage all looked at Ivy and smiled.

"And where does your grandmother live?" asked a gentleman.

"In Aylesbury," said Ivy.

The lady nodded. "That will be two or three stations," she said.

"Then—there is an Aylesbury," thought Ivy.

The lady got out, more people got in, and the train went on. Ivy grew sleepy watching the snowflakes fly past the window. The train seemed going very fast and she leaned her head against the carriage cushions and shut her eyes. When she opened them the train had stopped at a small station and the people in her carriage were all getting out. The gentleman lifted her suitcase down from the rack. "A . . . b . . . y" said the notice boards. Ivy could not read very well, but she knew A was for Aylesbury. In a moment she was out in the street, and the train had chuffed out of the station.

"I don't care," said Ivy, "this is where my grandmother lives."

The country town looked pleasant and clean after the city. There were cobbled streets going up and down and houses with gables overhanging the pavements and roofs jumbled together. Some of the houses had windows with many small panes, some had doors with brass knockers. The paint was bright and the curtains clean. "I like where my grandmother lives," said Ivy.

Presently she came to the market square where the Christmas market was going on. There were stalls of turkeys and geese, fruit stalls with oranges, apples, nuts and tangerines, that are like small oranges, wrapped in silver paper. Some stalls had holly, mistletoe and Christmas trees, some had flowers; there were stalls of china and glass and one with wooden spoons and bowls. A woman was selling balloons and an old man was cooking hot chestnuts. Men were shouting, the women had shopping bags and baskets, the children were running, everyone was buying or selling and laughing. Ivy had spent all her life in St. Agnes', she had not seen a market before and, "I won't look for my grandmother yet," said Ivy.

In the toyshop Mr. Blossom had never made so much money, Peter had never worked so hard. Peter was fifteen; he had red cheeks and a smile as wide as Mallow's and Wallow's; he took good care of the toys and did everything he could to help Mr. Blossom. "That abominable boy will sell every toy in the shop," grumbled Abracadabra.

"What's abominable?" asked Holly.

"It means not good," said the dolls, "but he is good. Dear, dear Peter!" whispered the dolls, but Abracadabra's green eyes had caught the light from a passing car. They gave a flash, and rattlebang! Peter fell down the stepladder from top to bottom. He bumped his elbow, grazed his knee and tore a big hole in his pocket. "Hold on! Go slow!" said Mr. Blossom.

"Yes, sir," said poor Peter in a very little voice.

"Did you see that, did you see that?" whispered the dolls. Holly wished she were farther away from Abracadabra.

Soon all the baby dolls but one were sold, and most of the Teddy bears. Mallow and Wallow were taken for twin boys' stockings; they were done up in two little parcels and carried away. Hardly a ball was left and not a single airplane. The sailor doll was sold, and the doll with the umbrella, but still no one had asked for Holly.

Dolls are not like us; we are alive as soon as we are born, but dolls are not really alive until they are played with. "I want to be played with," said Holly. "I want someone to move my arms and legs, to make me open and shut my eyes. I wish! I wish!" said Holly.

It began to be dark. The dusk made the lighted window shine so brightly that everyone stopped to look in. The children pressed their faces so closely against the glass that the tips of their noses looked like white cherries. Holly held out her arms and smiled her china smile, but the children walked away. "Stop. Stop," wished Holly, but they did not stop.

Abracadabra's eyes shone in the dusk. Holly began to be very much afraid.

One person stopped, but it was not a boy or girl. It was Mrs. Jones, the policeman's wife, from down the street. She was passing the toyshop on her way home when Holly's red dress caught her eye. "Pretty!" said Mrs. Jones, and stopped.

You and I would have felt Holly's wish at once, but Mrs. Jones had no children and it was so long since she had known a doll that she did not understand; only a feeling stirred in her that she had not had for a long time, a feeling of Christmas, and when she got home she told Mr. Jones, "This year we shall have a tree."

"Don't be daft," said Mr. Jones, but when Mrs. Jones had put her shopping away, a chicken and a small plum pudding for her and Mr. Jones' Christmas dinner, a piece of fish for the cats and a dozen fine handkerchiefs which were Mr. Jones' present, she went back to the market and bought some holly, mistletoe and a Christmas tree.

"A tree should have tinsel," said Mrs. Jones. She bought some tinsel. "And candles," she said; "candles are prettier than electric light." She bought twelve red candles. "They need candle clips," she said, and bought twelve of those. "And a tree should have some balls," thought Mrs. Jones, "glass balls in jewel colors, ruby red, emerald green and gold." She bought some, and a box of tiny silver crackers and a tinsel star. When she got home she stood the tree in the window and dressed it, putting the star on the top.

"Who is to look at it?" asked Mr. Jones.

Mrs. Jones thought for a moment and said, "Christmas needs children, Albert. Couldn't we find a little girl?"

"What's the matter with you today, my dear?" said Mr. Jones. "How could we find a little girl? You're daft," and it was a little sadly that Mrs. Jones put holly along the chimney shelf, hung mistletoe in the hall, tied a bunch of holly on the door knocker and went back to her housework.

Ivy was happy in the market. She bought a bag of chestnuts from the chestnut man; they were hot in her hands and she ate them one by one. She had a cup of tea from a tea stall on wheels, and from a sweet stall she bought a toffee apple. When her legs grew tired she sat down on a step and wrapped the ends of her coat round her knees. When she was cold she started to walk again.

Soon lights were lit all along the stalls; they looked like stars. The crowd grew thicker. People laughed and stamped in the snow to keep their feet warm; Ivy stamped too. The stall keepers shouted and called for people to come and buy. Ivy bought a blue balloon.

At St. Agnes' a telegraph boy rang the bell. He had a telegram for Miss Shepherd from the infants' home. It said, "Ivy not arrived. Suppose she is with you. Merry Christmas."

The boy rang and rang, but there was no one at St. Agnes' to answer the bell and at last he put a notice in the letter box, got on his bicycle and rode away.

In her house down the street Mrs. Jones kept looking at the Christmas tree. "Oughtn't there to be presents?" she asked. It was so long since she had a tree of her own that she could not be sure. She took Mr. Jones' handkerchiefs, wrapped them in white paper and tied them with some red ribbon she had by her, and put the parcel at the foot of the tree. That looked better, but still not quite right.

"There ought to be toys," said Mrs. Jones, and she called to Mr. Jones, "Albert."

Mr. Jones looked up from the newspaper he was reading.

"Would it be silly to buy . . . a little doll?"

"What is the matter with you today?" asked Mr. Jones, and he said again, "You're daft."

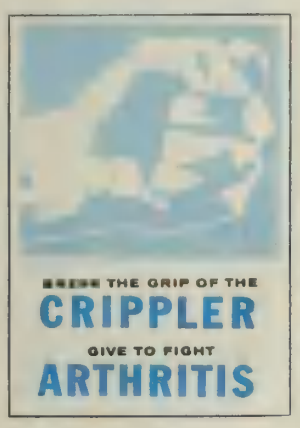
Soon it was time for him to go on duty.

"I shall be out all night," he told Mrs. Jones. "Two of the men are away sick. I shall take a short sleep at the police station and go on duty again. See you in the morning."

He kissed Mrs. Jones good-by and went out, but put his head round the door again. "Have a good breakfast waiting for me," said Mr. Jones.

In the toyshop it was closing time.

"What does that mean?" asked Holly.



"That it's over," said Abracadabra.

"Over?" Holly did not understand.

Mr. Blossom pulled the blind down on the door and put up a notice, "Closed."

"Closed. Hoo! Hoo!" said Abracadabra.

Mr. Blossom was so tired he told Peter to tidy the shop. "And you can lock up. Can I trust you?" asked Mr. Blossom.

"Yes, sir," said Peter proudly. It was the first time Mr. Blossom had trusted him with the key.

"You have been a good boy," said Mr. Blossom as he was going. "You may choose any toy you like—except the expensive ones like air guns or electric trains. Yes, choose yourself a toy," said Mr. Blossom. "Good night."

When Mr. Blossom had gone, "A toy!" said Peter, and he asked, "What does he think I am? A blooming kid?"

Peter swept up the bits of paper and string and straw and put them in the rubbish bin at the back of the shop. Then he put on his overcoat to go home. He turned out the lights—it was no use lighting the window now that the shopping was over—stepped outside and closed and locked the door. If he had waited a moment he would have heard a stirring, a noise, tiny whimperings. "What about us? What about us?" It was the toys.

Peter heard nothing. He put the key in his jacket pocket to keep it quite safe and turned to run home.

The key fell straight through the torn pocket into the snow. It did not make a sound.

"Hoo! Hoo!" said Abracadabra, and the snowflakes began to cover the key as Peter ran off.

The market was over as well. The crowd had gone, the stalls were packing up, the last Christmas trees were being sold. Ivy had spent all her money, the blue balloon had burst, her legs ached with tiredness and she shivered.

Then the lights went out; there were only pools of yellow from the lampposts, with patches of darkness between. A bit of paper blew against Ivy's legs, making her jump. Suddenly the market place seemed large and strange; she would have liked to see Miss Shepherd.

You might think that Ivy cried, but she was not that kind of little girl. Though the empty feeling ached inside her she pressed her lips tightly together, then said, "It's time I looked for my grandmother," and started off to look.

She walked up the cobbled streets between the houses.

How cozy they seemed with their lighted windows; smoke was going up from every chimney. "There are fires and beds and supper," said Ivy. Some of the houses had wreaths of holly on their front doors, paper chains and garlands in their rooms, and in almost every window was a Christmas tree.

When Ivy looked in she could see children. In one house they were sitting round a table eating; in another they were hanging stockings from the chimney shelf; in some they were doing up parcels, but, "I must look for a house with a Christmas tree and no children," said Ivy.

She knew there would be a tree, "Because my grandmother is expecting me," said Ivy.

The toyshop was still and dark. "There will be no more shopping," said Abracadabra, and the whisper ran round the toys, "No shopping. No shopping."

"Then . . . we are the ones not sold," said a doll.

There was a long silence.

"I can be sold any time," said a bride doll at last. "Weddings are always."

"I am in yellow, with primroses," said a bridesmaid. "I shall be sold in the spring."

"I am in pink, with roses," said another. "They will buy me in the summer," but Holly had a red dress, for Christmas. What would be done with her?

"You will be put back into stock," said Abracadabra.

"Please . . . what is stock?" whispered Holly.

"It is shut up and dark," said Abracadabra as if he liked that very much. "No one sees you or disturbs you. You get covered with dust and I shall be there," said Abracadabra.

Holly wished she could crack.

"This is my grandmother's house," said Ivy, but when she got to the house it was not. That happened several times. "Then it's that one," she said, but it was not that one either. She began to be very cold and tired.

Somebody came down the street. Even in the snow his tread was loud. It was a big policeman. (As a matter of fact, it was Mr. Jones.)

Ivy knew as well as you or I know that policemen are kind people and do not like little girls to wander about alone after dark in a strange town. "He might send me to the infants' home," said Ivy and, quick as a mouse going into its hole, she whisked into a passage between two shops.

"Queer!" said Mr. Jones. "I thought I saw something green."

At the end of the passage was a shed and Ivy whisked into it and stood behind the door. There was something odd about that shed: it was warm. Ivy did not know how an empty shed could be warm on a cold night, but I shall tell you.

The shed belonged to a baker and was built against the wall behind his oven. All day he had been baking bread and rolls for Christmas and the oven was still hot. When Ivy put her hand on the wall she had to take it away quickly, for the wall was baking hot.

Soon she stopped shivering. In a corner was a pile of flour sacks and she sat down on them. Then she took off her coat, lay down on the sacks and spread the coat over her.

In a moment she was fast asleep.

The toyshop was close by the passage. It was too dark to be noticed, though Abracadabra's eyes shone like green lamps.

"Shopping is over. Hoo! Hoo!" said Abracadabra.

"Over. Over," mourned the toys.

They did not know and Abracadabra did not know that it is when shopping is over that Christmas begins.

Soon it was not dark, for the snow had stopped and the moon came up and lighted all the town. The roofs sparkled with frost as did the snow on the pavements and roads. In the toyshop window the toys showed, not as bright as day but bright as moonlight, which is far more beautiful. Holly's dress looked a pale red and her hair was pale gold.

Dolls do not lie down to go to sleep; they only do that when you remember to put them to bed and, as you often forget, they would be tired if they had to wait; they can sleep where they stand or sit and now the dolls in the toyshop window slept in their places, all but Holly. She could not go to sleep. She was a Christmas doll and it was beginning to be Christmas. She could not know why, but she was excited. Then all at once, softly, bells began to ring.

Long after most children are in bed, on Christmas Eve, the church bells in towns and villages begin to ring. Soon the clocks strike twelve and it is Christmas.

Holly heard the bells and . . . what was this? People were walking in the street . . . hurrying. "Hsst! T-whoo!" said Abracadabra at them as they passed, but they took no notice.

"Then . . . it has started," said Holly.

"What has started?" said Abracadabra.

"It," said Holly. She could not explain better than that, for she did not know yet what "it" meant—this was, after all, her first Christmas—but the bells grew louder and more and more people passed. Then, it may have been the pin of Holly's price ticket, or a PAPER TREE DECORATIONS. Three dimensional angels or choir boys are easy to make. Have children cut out a paper circle, fold in half and cut out an angel silhouette (see above)...a head with a crown, wings and a skirt. Unfold, color and join edges of skirt to form a cone. Or, to make choir boy costumes, bring wings forward, eliminate crown and color. For a personal touch, paste on faces from extra snapshots of family and friends.

MAKING GIFTS. Tin cans, oatmeal containers and all kinds of boxes can be made into attractive gifts, such as pencil holders, yarn baskets, and trays. Let children create their own over-all designs on plain or colored paper. Cut strips of paper to fit can or box and paste on. Even old wastepaper baskets can be renewed this way.

"CRAYOLA" HOLLY. Holly leaves and berries made from bits of worn-down crayons make unusual decorations. Peel off paper and soften crayons on radiator. (Don't use direct flame.) When crayons are soft enough, even small children can model glossy leaves and berries. Binney & Smith Inc., 380 Madison Ave., New York 17, N.Y. 7.14 pine of tinsel come loose from the shelf, but Holly felt a tiny pricking as sharp as a prickle n a holly leaf. "Wish," said the prickle, wish."

"But . . . the shop is closed," said Holly, the children are in bed. Abracadabra says I ust go into sto——" The prickle interrupted. Wish. Wish!" said the prickle. "Wish!" It ent on till Holly wished.

Ivy thought the bells woke her, or perhaps ie passing feet, but then why did she feel omething sharp like a thistle or a hard straw one of the sacks? She sat up, but she was alf asleep and she thought the feet were the . Agnes children marching down to breakst and the bells were the breakfast bell. Then ie saw she was still in the shed though it as filled with a new light, a strange silver ght. "Moonlight?" asked Ivy and rubbed er eyes.

She was warm and comfortable on the cks under the green coat—though that had eat white patches on it from the flour—o warm and comfortable to move and she y down, but again she felt that thistle or arp straw. The light seemed to be calling r, the bells, the hurrying feet; the prickle emed to tell her to get up.

Ivy put on her coat and went out.

In the street the moonlight was so bright at once again Ivy thought it was morning d she was in St. Agnes' and the bells were e breakfast bell. "Only . . . there are so any of them," said sleepy Ivy.

She walked a few steps to the toyshop. She d not know how it came to be there and e thought she was in her St. Agnes bedroom d it was filled with toys. Then, "Not toys," id Ivy, "a toy," and she was wide awake. ie did not even see Abracadabra glaring at r with his green eyes, she looked straight Holly.

She saw Holly's dress and socks and shoes, She is red and green too" thought Ivy. She w Holly's hair, brown eyes, little teeth and autiful joints. They were just what Ivy ked, and, "My Christmas doll!" said Ivy.

Holly saw Ivy's face pressed against the ndow as she had seen so many children's ces that day, but, "This one is different," id Holly.

Ivy's hands in their woolen gloves held to e ledge where it said "Blossom, High Class ys and Games." Holly looked at Ivy's nds. "Soon they will be holding me," thought olly. Ivy's coat even in the moonlight was beautiful a green as Holly's dress was a autiful red, so that they seemed to match d, "My Christmas girl!" said Holly.

"But the window is between," said Abradabra.

The window was in between and the toyop door was locked, but even if it had been en, Ivy had no money. "Hoo! Hoo!" said racadabra, but, remember, not only Holly t Ivy was wishing now.

"I wish ——"

"I wish ——"

The toys woke up. "A child," they whisred, "a child," and they wished too.

Wishes are powerful things. Ivy stepped ck from the window and Abracadabra's es grew pale as cr-runch went something der Ivy's heel. It was something hidden just der the snow. "Hsst!" said Abracadabra. -whoo!" but Ivy bent down and picked up key.

In the moonlight it was bright silver. eter's key. Peter's key," whispered the toys. Footsteps sounded in the street, people re coming from church; Ivy put the key in r pocket and quickly ran back to the shed. She had to wait a long time for the people pass as they stopped to say "Merry Christas" to one another, to give one another rcels, and Ivy sat down on the sacks to rest. esently she gave another great yawn. esently she lay down and spread her coat er her. Presently she went to sleep.

The toys had gone to sleep too. "But I n't," said Holly, "I must wait for my ristmas girl."

She stayed awake for a long time, but she s only a little doll . . . and presently she l asleep where she stood.

Very early on Christmas morning Mrs. Jones got up and tidied her living room. She lit a fire, swept the hearth and dusted the furniture. She laid a table for breakfast with a pink-and-white cloth, her best blue china, a loaf of crusty bread, a pat of new butter in a glass dish, honey in a blue pot, a bowl of sugar and a jug of milk. She had some fresh brown eggs and, in the kitchen, she put sausages to sizzle in a pan. Then she set the teapot to warm on the hob, lighted the candles on the Christmas tree and sat down by the fire to wait.

The baker's oven cooled in the night and Ivy woke with the cold. The shed was icy; Ivy's eyelashes were stuck together with rime and the tip of her nose felt frozen. When she tried to stand up her legs were so stiff that she almost fell over; when she put on her coat her fingers were so numb that they could not do up the buttons.

Ivy was a sensible little girl; she knew she had to get warm and she did not cry, but, "I m-must h-hop and sk-skip," she said through her chattering teeth and there in the shed she swung her arms, in-out, out-in, and clapped her hands. Outside she tried to run, but her legs felt heavy and her head seemed to swim. "I m-must f-find m-my g-g-grandmother q-q-quickly," said Ivy.

She went into the street and how cold it was there! The wind blew under her coat, the snow on the pavements had turned to ice and was slippery. She tried to hop, but the snow was like glass. Ivy's fingers and nose hurt in the cold. "If-f I l-look at m-my d-d-doll, I m-might-t f-feel b-b-b-better," said Ivy, but she turned the wrong way.

It was the wrong way for the toyshop, but perhaps it was the right way for Ivy, for a hundred yards down the street she came to the Joneses' house.

"I must look for a house with a tree and no children." That is what she had said. Now she looked in at the window and there was no sign of any children, but there was a Christmas tree lit. Ivy saw the fire, "To w-warm m-me," whispered Ivy and, oh, she was cold! She saw the table with the pink-and-white cloth, blue china, bread and butter, honey and milk, the teapot warming, "My b-breakfast," whispered Ivy and, oh, she was hungry! She saw Mrs. Jones sitting by the fire, in her clean apron, waiting. Ivy stood quite still, then, "My g-g-grandmother," whispered Ivy.

Holly woke with a start. "Oh! I have been asleep," said Holly in dismay. "Oh! I must have missed my little Christmas girl."

"She won't come back," said Abracadabra. "It's Christmas Day. She's playing with her new toys."

"I am her new toy," said Holly.

"Hoo! Hoo!" said Abracadabra.

"I am," said Holly and she wished. I think her wish was bigger than Abracadabra, for when Ivy lifted her hand to Mrs. Jones' knocker, a prickle from the bunch of holly ran into her finger. "Ow!" said Ivy. The prickle was so sharp that she took her hand down and, "F-first I must g-get my d-d-doll," said Ivy.

If Ivy had stopped to think, she would have known she could not get her doll. How could she when the shop was locked and the window was in between? Besides, Holly was not Ivy's doll and had not even been sold. A wise person would have known this, but sometimes it is better to feel a prickle than to be wise.

"Hullo," said Ivy to Holly through the toyshop window, "g-g-good morning."

Holly could not say "Hullo" back, but she could wish Ivy good morning—with a doll's wish.

In the daylight Holly was even more beautiful than she had been by moonlight, Ivy was even dearer.

"A little girl!" sneered Abracadabra. "There are hundreds of little girls."

"Not for me," said Holly.

"A little doll!" sneered Abracadabra. "There are hundreds of little dolls," and if Ivy could have heard him through the toyshop window she would have said, "Not for me."

Ivy gazed at Holly through the window.

She gazed so hard she did not hear footsteps coming down the street, heavy steps and light ones and a queer snuffling sound. The heavy steps were Mr. Jones', the light ones were Peter's and the snuffling sound was Peter trying not to cry.

"I put it in my pocket," Peter was saying. "I forgot my pocket was torn. Oh, what shall I do? What shall I do?" said Peter.

Mr. Jones patted his shoulder and asked, "What sort of a key was it now?"

A key? Ivy turned round. She saw Mr. Jones and jumped. Then she made herself as small as she could against the window.

"A big iron key, but it looked like silver," said Peter. He and Mr. Jones began to look along the pavement.

"Mr. Blossom trusted me," said Peter. His wide smile was gone and his face looked quite pale. "I don't like boys" thought Ivy, but Peter was saying, "He trusted me. He'll never trust me again," and though Peter was a big boy, when he said that he looked as if he really might burst into tears.

"A boy cry?" asked Ivy. She had never seen Barnabas cry. "I didn't know boys could," thought Ivy.

Peter was saying, "A thief might have picked it up."

"It w-wasn't a th-thief. It was m-m-me," said Ivy and put her hand in her pocket and pulled out the key. "S-so you n-needn't c-c-cry," said Ivy to Peter.

Can you imagine how Peter's tears disappeared and his smile came back? "Cry? Who cried?" said Peter scornfully, and Ivy thought it better not to say "You."

Mr. Jones put the key in the lock and it fitted. "I suppose I had better go in," said Peter, "and see if everything's all right."

"Well, I'm going home," said Mr. Jones. "You know where I live. If anything's wrong, pop in." It was as he turned to go home that Mr. Jones saw Ivy. "So . . . there was something green," said Mr. Jones.

Ivy knew how she must look: her coat and her hair, her socks and her shoes were dusted with flour from the sacks; she had not been able to comb her hair because she had no comb, and her face had smears across it from the toffee apple and "I think you are lost," said Mr. Jones.

His voice was so kind that the empty feeling ached in Ivy; it felt so empty that her mouth began to tremble. She could not shut her lips, but, "I'm n-not l-lost," said Ivy, "I'm g-g-going to m-my g-g-g-grandmother."

"I see," said Mr. Jones. He looked at Ivy again. "Where does your grandmother live?" asked Mr. Jones.

Ivy took his hand and led him down the street to the Joneses' house. "This is m-my g-g-grandmother's," said Ivy.

Mr. Jones seemed rather surprised. "Are you sure?" asked Mr. Jones.

"Of course," said Ivy. "L-look in at the w-window. There," she told him, "th-there's my Ch-Christmas t-tree."

Mr. Jones thought a moment, then, "Perhaps it is your Christmas tree," he said.

"Sh-shall we kn-knock?" asked Ivy, but, "You needn't knock," said Mr. Jones, "you can come in."

The toys were all in their places when Peter opened the door. "No thanks to you," said Abracadabra.

Perhaps Peter heard him, for Peter said, "Thanks to that little girl."

I do not know how it was, but Peter had the idea that Ivy was Mr. Jones' little girl. "He was kind to me," said Peter, "and so was she." Peter was very grateful and, "What can I do for them?" he asked, then, "I know," said Peter. Mr. Blossom had told him to take any toy and, "I'll take her a doll," said Peter. "I can slip it into their house easy, without saying a word, but . . . what doll would she like?" asked Peter.

The toys all held their breath. "What doll would she like?"

"A bride doll," said Abracadabra with a gleam of his eyes.

A bride doll was standing on the counter and Peter went to pick her up, but he must have put his hand on the pin of her price ticket or a wire in the orange-blossom flowers on her dress, for, "Ow!" said Peter and drew back his hand.

Abracadabra looked at Holly. Holly smiled.

"All little girls like baby dolls," said Abracadabra. "Take her a baby doll."

There was one baby doll left. She was in the window; Peter reached to take her out, but the safety pin on the baby doll's bib must have been undone, for, "Ow!" cried Peter and drew back his hand.

"Hsst! T-whoo," said Abracadabra to Holly. Holly smiled.

It was the same with the primrose bridesmaid. "Ow!" cried Peter. The same with the "Christmas! Bah! Humbug!"

The man in the wheel chair leaned into the microphone. "Christmas!" he snarled. "Bah! Humbug!" And, as they had in Christmases past, millions of young listeners chilled at the mental picture of the baleful Scrooge.

It was a Christmas institution, back in the Forties, this annual reading of Charles Dickens' classic. Its reader was something of an institution himself. In his turbulent lifetime he had been an unsuccessful painter but a good amateur second-baseman, a composer whose music was played by the New York Philharmonic, and a model for Frederick Remington.

To most people, though, he was Lionel Barrymore, the actor, and they loved him.

He was both crusty and kindly (he loved reading "A Christmas Carol"), adventurous, stubbornly independent in thought and outlook. And game as they come. Although an accident in 1936 imprisoned him in a wheel chair, he went resolutely on—working in motion pictures and making public appearances for nearly twenty years more.

No question but that Lionel Barrymore was one-of-a-kind. Yet the qualities so richly combined in him exist in a large measure among all the 170 million of us who call ourselves Americans.

They're why we are what we are, why our country is one of the strongest on earth. And why there is no wiser investment than an investment in America—through U. S. rose. "Ow!" and "Here, I'm getting fed up," said Peter. "Who's trying this on?" I do not know what made him look at Abracadabra. Abracadabra's eyes gleamed, but just above Abracadabra, in her place, Peter saw Holly.

"Why, of course! The little red Christmas doll," said Peter. "The very thing!" but as he stepped up to the glass shelf Abracadabra was there.

Peter said that Abracadabra must have toppled, for a toy owl cannot fly, but it seemed for a moment that Abracadabra was right in his face; the green eyes were close, the spread wings, the hooked beak and the claws. Peter let out a cry and hit Abracadabra, who fell on the floor. "Out of my way," cried Peter, and he gave Abracadabra a kick. Then Abracadabra did fly. He went sailing across the shop and landed head down in the rubbish bin.

"Oooh! Aaah!" cried all the toys in terror, but Peter sprang after him and shut the lid down tight.

Then he picked up Holly from the shelf in the window and ran pell-mell to the Joneses'.

When Mr. Jones and Ivy came in Mrs. Jones was in the kitchen turning the sausages. Mr. Jones told Ivy to wait in the hall.

"Merry Christmas," said Mr. Jones to Mrs. Jones and kissed her.

"Merry Christmas," said Mrs. Jones, but she sounded a little sad.

Mr. Jones had a present in his pocket for Mrs. Jones, a little gold brooch. He took it out, unwrapped it and pinned it on her dress. "Oh, how pretty, Albert," said Mrs. Jones, but she still sounded sad.

"I have another Christmas present for you," said Mr. Jones, and laughed. "It can walk and talk," said Mr. Jones, and laughed still more and then he brought Ivy in.

When Mrs. Jones saw Ivy she did not laugh; for a moment she stood still, then she dropped the fork and knelt down on the floor and put her hands on Ivy's shoulders. "Oh, Albert!" said Mrs. Jones. "Albert!" She looked at Ivy for a long time and two tears came into her eyes and rolled down her cheeks. Ivy, with her glove, wiped the tears away and the emptiness went out of Ivy and never came back.

"Dearie me!" said Mrs. Jones, getting to her feet. "What am I thinking of? You must have a hot bath at once."

"Breakfast first," said Mr. Jones and Ivy asked, "Couldn't I just see my Christmas tree?"

Mrs. Jones' living room was as bright and clean as it had looked through the window. The fire was warm on Ivy's legs, the table was close to her now, and in the window was the tree, "With a star on the top," whispered Ivy.

The injuries we do and those we suffer are seldom weighed in the same scales.

AESOP

"But why, oh why," Mrs. Jones was saying to Mr. Jones outside the door, "why didn't I buy that little doll?"

"And the shops are shut," whispered Mr. Jones. "We shall have to explain."

Ivy did not hear them. "Red candles!" she was whispering. "Silver crackers! And glass balls!"

She stopped. Mrs. Jones came in and gave a cry. "Well, I'll be danged!" said Mr. Jones, for at the foot of the tree, by the parcel of handkerchiefs, stood Holly.

Though Mrs. Jones was a little young to be a grandmother, she and Mr. Jones adopted Ivy, which means they took her as their own, and of course Holly as well. Miss Shepherd came to visit them and arrange this. "Please tell Barnabas," said Ivy.

Mrs. Jones made Ivy a green dress like Holly's red one, but with a red petticoat and red socks. She made Holly a red coat like Ivy's green one and knitted her a pair of tiny green woolen gloves so that they matched when they went out.

They pass the toyshop often, but there is no Abracadabra.

"Where is the owl?" Mr. Blossom had asked when the shop opened again, and Peter had to say, "I put him in the rubbish bin."

"Good gracious me!" said Mr. Blossom. "Get him out at once," but when they lifted the lid Abracadabra was not there.

"Sir, the dustman must have taken him away," said Peter, standing up stiff and straight.

I do not know if that was true, but Abracadabra was never seen again.

"Never seen again," said the toys. They sounded happy. "Never seen again," and long, long afterward in the toyshop they told tales of Abracadabra.

Sometimes Holly and Ivy meet Crumple, who waves his trunk at them. Once they saw Mallow and Wallow put out on a window sill. They often see Peter and Mr. Blossom; in spite of Abracadabra's disappearance, Mr. Blossom trusts Peter.

"But if you had not found the key," says Peter to Ivy.

"If I had not come to look at Holly," says Ivy.

"If I had not gone to Mr. Jones," says Peter.

"If Mrs. Jones had not bought the Christmas tree," but it goes farther back than that. If Ivy had not slept in the shed . . . if the baker had not lit his oven . . . if Ivy had not got out of the train . . . if Barnabas had not laughed at Ivy . . . if Holly ——

"If I had not wished," says Holly.

I told you in the beginning that it was a story about wishing.

DESERT CHRISTMAS

No visitor is allowed to feel himself a stranger. Not a single Christmas package reached us from home—we had warned against taking a chance in catching up with us—but people we had never met until a few days before dropped by with token gifts: a carton of cigarettes, prettily wrapped; a lovely piece of native handiwork; a box of homemade cookies. And every day there was an invitation: "Please come and see our tree"—and have tea or a bit of lunch, or a welcome American dinner.

Although one can love "strange foreign parts"—and few people more than I—at Christmas one yearns for one's own people and it can be a homesick time. I missed my son and daughter-in-law, and even more my small grandchild. But we celebrated Christmas with other people's children and grandchildren as we would have done with our own.

And now, as the glorious season rolls round again, I find my mind going back to the desert Christmas. I wonder what sweet-faced girl will be this year's Madonna; whether the camels will kneel on schedule or buck obstinately and snort, as they often do, in a most supercilious way; whether the boy shepherds will be able to herd their silly sheep; whether the evening star will come up at exactly the appropriate moment.

And in my ears I hear once again the golden chorus:

"Joy to the world, the Lord is come!"

Not once for all time, I think, but over and over, reborn in the heart, reborn in the mind, reborn in the will, ever ready to be received:

"Let earth receive her King ——"

and to

"Make the nations prove,
The glories of His righteousness
And wonders of His love."

So let us send a message from home across the air, to the Persian Gulf, to far-off homes where the JOURNAL is also read, and to everybody everywhere: the old, homely message—Merry Christmas! END
